Verrazano, an Italian navigator, in 1524, was probably the first European to enter New York Bay. In 1609 Henry Hudson, an English navigator in the employ of the Dutch East India Company, sailed up New York Bay and the Hudson River. About four years later the Dutch began the establishment of trading-posts on Manhattan Island, where a place soon arose which received the name of New Amsterdam. Among the early settlers were many Flemings and Walloons. In 1664 the town was surrendered to the British, taking the name of New York; retaken by the Dutch nine years afterwards, it was held by them but a single year. In 1677 there were 384 houses. In 1700 the population was 6000. The New York Gazette, a weekly paper, appeared in 1725. From 1776–83 the city was in the hands of the British. New York was the meeting-place of Congress from 1785–90 and here Washington was inaugurated president in 1789. In 1807 the first steamboat was built at this port to navigate the Hudson. The opening of the Erie Canal in 1825 gave a great impetus to the growth of New York. In 1835 a conflagration destroyed a large part of the principal business section of the city. Steam communication with the Old World was inaugurated in 1838. In 1842 the first Croton Aqueduct was completed. In 1863 the bloody anti-conscription riots took place in New York. In 1873 the limits of the city were extended beyond Manhattan Island, the southern portion of Westchester co. being annexed to it. In 1878 a grand system of overhead transportation was inaugurated. In 1883 the Brooklyn Bridge was opened to traffic and in 1890 the new Croton Aqueduct was completed. In 1897–98 New York, Brooklyn (with its surroundings), Long Island City, Staten Island, etc., were united into one municipality. The second great bridge across the East River was opened to the public in 1904 and in the following year the great subway railroad was put into operation.

The population of New York for the decennial periods since the first national census is as follows: in 1790, 33,131; in 1800, 60,489; in 1810, 96,373; in 1820, 123,706; in 1830, 191,112; in 1840, 312,710; in 1850, 515,547; in 1860, 813,669; in 1870, 942,292; in 1880, 1,206,299; in 1890, 1,515,301; and in 1900, after the formation of Greater New York, 3,437,202, of whom 1,850,093 belonged to the borough of Manhattan and 200,507 to the borough of the Bronx. The population of the remaining boroughs was: Brooklyn, 1,166,582; Richmond, 67,021; and Queens, 152,999. The population now (1905) is in the neighborhood of 4,000,000. The cities and towns in the outskirts of New York, within a radius of 12 miles from the city-hall, had a population in 1900 of more than 750,000. They include Jersey City, Hoboken, West Hoboken, Union, Bayonne, Newark, the Oranges, Elizabeth, Hackensack, etc., all in New Jersey. A zone beyond this, 12 miles wide, had a population of between 300,000 and 400,000. In this zone are Paterson, Passaic, Plainfield, Montclair, Perth Amboy, and other cities in New Jersey, and Yonkers, Mount Vernon, New Rochelle, and other places in New York. Beyond this is still a great ring full of towns and villages which are residential suburbs of New York. The total population of New York and its surroundings within a radius of 30 miles from the city-hall is now about 5,250,000. The bulk of the inhabitants of New York are foreign born or of foreign parentage. The foreign-born alone constitute about one-third of the population. Of these the most numerous are the Jews (mainly from Russia, Russian Poland, and Austria-Hungary), Irish, Germans, and Italians. There are large numbers of French, English, Scotch, Hungarians, Swedes, and other Europeans. There are Chinese and Syriac quarters in the lower part of the city. The number of negroes in 1900 was 60,666. The rate of mortality in New York, considering the unsanitary conditions under which a large part of the inhabitants dwell on account of over-crowding, is surprisingly low.

New York, a post-village of Wayne co., Iowa, about 13 miles S. of Chariton. Pop. 100.

New York, a post-village of Henderson co., Tex. Pop. 80.

New York Bay, an inlet of the Atlantic Ocean, at the mouth of the Hudson River, on which the city of New York is situated. It consists of Upper New York Bay (or New York Bay proper) and Lower New York Bay. The former is an almost land-locked harbor, roughly circular in shape, with a greatest length of about 6 miles, enclosed by New Jersey (Jersey City and Bayonne), Manhattan Island, the borough of Brooklyn (included in New York city) and Staten Island (borough of Richmond in New York city). It communicates by the strait called the Narrows, a little more than a mile in width, with the Lower Bay, and by the East River with Long Island Sound. The Kill van Kull and Staten Island Sound connect it by a narrow and circuitous channel with Raritan Bay. This harbor is one of the finest havens in the New World. In its northern part are Governor's, Bedloe's, and Ellis islands, all belonging to the United States government. Governor's Island is a military station, with fortifications. On Bedloe's Island is the colossal statue of "Liberty Enlightening the World," designed by Bartholdi. The Lower Bay is between Staten Island, Long Island, and New Jersey. Its entrance, between Sandy Hook on the S. and Coney Island (a projection of Long Island) on the N., is about 6 miles across. Its western prolongation is Raritan Bay. Vessels of the greatest draught can pass the bar at Sandy Hook at high water and sail up to the piers of New York, Brooklyn, Jersey City, or Hoboken. There are strong fortifications on Sandy Hook, and the Narrows are defended by forts Hamilton, Lafayette, Tompkins, and Wadsworth.

New York Mills, a banking post-village of Ottertail co., Minn., on the Northern Pacific R., 78 miles E. of Moorhead. Pop. in 1900, 353.

New York Mills, a post-village of Oneida co., N.Y., on Sadaquada Creek and near the Erie Canal, about 95 miles WNW. of Albany. It has manufactures of yarns and cottons. Pop. about 1500.

New Zealand, a British colony in the South Pacific Ocean, consisting of a chain of islands, embracing two large ones (North and South islands) and one small one (Stewart Island, formerly known as South Island), besides others of less note. By a decree of June, 1901, the boundary of the colony was extended so as to include Cook Island and some other islets of the Pacific. The Auckland, Chatham, and Kermadec islands, lying from 300 to 600 miles distant, had previously been attached. The main chain extends from Cape North, in lat. 34° 22′ S., to Cape South, in lat. 47° 20′ S., and from Cape West, in lon. 166° 40′ E., to Cape Waiapu, in lon. 178° 38′ E. The areas of the three islands are estimated as follows: North Island, 44,468 sq. m.; South (formerly known as Middle) Island, 58,525 sq. m.; Stewart (South) Island, 665 sq. m., giving for the three 103,658 sq. m. Pop. in 1901, 815,862, including 43,143 Maoris and 2857 Chinese. Cook Strait separates North Island from South Island and the latter is separated from Stewart Island by Foveaux Strait. When established as a colony, in 1840, North, Middle, and South islands were re-named—New Ulster, New Munster, and New Leinster; but these titles are out of use since the provincial divisions with their local governments have been instituted. The provincial divisions are now known as Auckland, Taranaki, Wellington, and Hawke Bay, on North Island; and Marlborough, Nelson, Westland, Canterbury, and Otago, on South Island.

The New Zealand coast measures upward of 4300 miles in length and is deeply indented by mountain-rimmed fjords, the scenery of which frequently recalls that of Norway. There are a number of good harbors, some of which are almost unsurpassed in the southern hemisphere. Parallel mountain-ridges, trending in a general way from the SW. to the NE., form the backbone of the region and extend in tectonic continuation from the extreme SW. to the promontory which in North Island bounds the Bay of Plenty on the SE. These mountains in the South Island are of an Alpine character and present all the distinctive features of the true European Alps. They culminate, in about lat. 43° 15′ S., in Mount Cook, 12,350 feet in elevation. Other lofty summits of the New Zealand Alps are Hector, Tyndall, and Petermann. This region is one of extensive glaciation (Godley, Tasman, Mueller glaciers), the glacial tongues in some instances descending to within 1000 feet or less of sea-level.

A number of volcanic peaks appear prominently in North Island, extending in a "volcanic line" from Mount Egmont (8270 feet), Ruapehu (9008 feet), and Tongariro (the last two active) in the SW. to White Island in the Bay of Plenty in the NE. Associated with or on either side of this line is a vast region of hot springs, lakes, geysers, and sinter deposits, one of the most remarkable in the world. Southward of the Bay of Plenty, in Auckland, is the famous region of Rotomahana and Rotorua, which was visited by the catastrophic eruption of Tarawera in June, 1886, and where were located the famous "pink" and "white terraces" (sinter) destroyed at that time. See these titles.

New Zealand has considerable areas of flat land, some of which is eminently adapted to cultivation. The Canterbury Plains in South Island, measuring about 160 miles in length and 30 miles in greatest width, are almost a dead level. The running waters of New Zealand are very numerous, but they are mostly torrential in character and ill adapted to navigation. The largest river of the colony is the Waikato, in North Island, which flows N. from Lake Taupo and is traversed by river-steamboats for much of its course. Of the total area of the land nearly one-third is still under forest, the Kauri pine and other conifers yielding fine timber. The open lands are largely overgrown with grasses and the abundant New Zealand flax (Phormium tenax). A glory of the forest lands is constituted by the giant tree-ferns, which frequently attain 50–60 feet in height. Nearly all the commoner fruits of temperate Europe may be grown, and in some places the lemon and orange fruit abundantly. The chief agricultural crops are wheat, oats, barley, and hay. The live-stock of the colony is very numerous; the number of sheep in 1902 was upward of 20,000,000. Owing to its isolated and oceanic character the indigenous fauna is an impoverished and clearly defined one, its quality being negative rather than positive. Its most interesting features are to-day, perhaps, best seen among birds in the wingless apteryx (or kiwi) and the kakapo (or ground-parrot). The extinct fauna comprises the recently exterminated giant wingless (struthious) birds known as the moa. All the forms of domestic animals have been introduced and some of these, such as the hog and rabbit, have run wild. A number of the useful metals and minerals have a fairly wide distribution and are being mined in quantity. The gold output of the year 1901 was 455,561 ounces, valued at £1,753,783; silver, 571,134 ounces; coal, 1,227,638 tons, valued at £613,819. Some ore of antimony and manganese has also been obtained. The value of the colonial produce exported in 1901 was £12,650,000, of which the wool exports amounted to £3,699,103; the frozen meats, to £2,253,262; hides, skins, and leather, to £477,495; and kauri gum, to £446,114. The climate is equable, pleasant, and salubrious, the mean annual temperature being: for Auckland, in lat. 36° 50′ S., 59°; for New Plymouth, in 39° 3′ S., 56°; for Wellington, in 41° 16′ S., 55°; for Nelson, in 41° 15′ S., 55°; for Christchurch, in 43° 35′ S., 53°; and for Dunedin, in 45° 46′ S., 50°. Mean of the coldest month at Otago, 40°, and of the warmest at Auckland, 68°. High winds prevail. The average rainfall in North Island varies in the respective provinces from 45½ inches to 59 inches annually, while in South Island it is from 30 to 34½ inches. In parts of the western mountain-tracts the precipitation may be as much as 120 or even 150 inches. Snow seldom falls, excepting in the southern parts of South Island.

The first railroad in New Zealand, between Christchurch and Lyttelton, was opened Dec. 1, 1863. In 1872 a comprehensive railway system was commenced by the government, and in 1893 the total length of lines which had been constructed was 1886 miles, and in 1902, 2323 miles. The Maoris, or primitive inhabitants of New Zealand, represent the most promising type of the Polynesian race. They are well-formed physically, robust and vigorous, exhibit great mental capacity, are gifted with poetic instincts, and evince an appreciation of the benefits of European civilization. In the fierce wars which they waged with the whites and which ended in their subjugation 40 years ago, they displayed great military skill as well as prowess. They profess Christianity and are admitted to a share in the government. The Maoris are not dying out under the new conditions of existence imposed upon them by European domination. New Zealand was discovered in 1642 by Tasman. Cook explored the islands between 1769 and 1777. Missionary labors were prosecuted with success in the early part of the nineteenth century. British colonization was begun in 1840 under the auspices of the New Zealand Company, and in the same year England proclaimed her dominion over the islands. The Maoris were subdued only after protracted bloodshed. In 1852 a constitutional form of government was established. The legislative power is vested in a governor (who is assisted by a ministry of 8 members) and a general assembly consisting of 2 chambers. The capital is Wellington. Other important towns are Auckland, Christchurch, and Dunedin. The leading educational institutions are Otago University, at Dunedin; Canterbury College, at Christchurch; Auckland University College, and Victoria College, at Wellington. The University of New Zealand is solely an examining body, standing in affiliation with the above colleges. In no other country of the world has state socialism and the participation of government in matters affecting labor and capital advanced with such strides as in New Zealand.

New Zion, a post-township of Clarendon co., S.C., 20 miles NE. of Manning. Pop. in 1900, 1095.

Nexö, nĕks′ö, a town of Denmark, on the coast of the island of Bornholm. Pop. about 2000.

Nexon, nĕks`ôN′, a town of France, in Haute-Vienne, 10 miles S. of Limoges. Pop. 1000 (commune, 3000).

Ney, a post-village of Defiance co., Ohio, on the Cincinnati Northern R., 6½ miles S. of Bryan. Pop. in 1900, 289.

Neyland, a town of Wales, in Pembrokeshire, on Milford Haven. Pop. in 1901, 2827.

Neyland, a post-village of Hunt co., Tex., on the St. Louis Southwestern and the Texas Midland Rs. The banking point is Greenville. Pop. 100.

Neyva, Neiva, or Neiba, a town of Santo Domingo, 70 miles E. of Port-au-Prince, on the river Neyva, which enters Neyva Bay on the S. coast, after a course of 75 miles.

Neyva, a town of Colombia. See NEIVA.

Nezhin, or Niezhin, nyĕ′zhin, a town of Russia, government and 36 miles SSE. of Tchernigov, on the Oster. It is the seat of a historico-philological institute of high rank, with a library of 60,000 volumes. Tobacco is an important crop of the district. Pop. in 1897, 32,100.

Nezperce, a banking post-village of Nez Percés co., Idaho, 45 miles SE. of Kendrick. Pop. about 500.

Nez Percés, a county in the NW. part of Idaho, borders on Washington. Area, 1421 sq. m. It is bounded on the S. by the Salmon River and intersected by the Clearwater. The Snake (or Lewis) River forms part of its W. boundary. Capital, Lewiston. Pop. in 1890, 2847; in 1900, 13,748.

Nezpique Bayou, nā′peek bī′oo, La., rises in St. Landry parish, runs southward, and unites with the Plaquemine Brulé on the E. border of Calcasieu parish to form the Mermenteau River.

N'gami, n'gä′me, a former lake of southern Africa, in the Bechuanaland Protectorate, between lat. 20° and 21° S. Elevation, about 3300 feet. The Tioge River was its chief tributary and the discharge was effected by the Zuga. The lake has practically disappeared and its place is now occupied by a reed-grown muck. The lake was discovered by Livingstone in 1849.

Ngan-hwei, n'gȧn'hwā', an inland province of China, between lat. 29° and 34° N., enclosed by Kiang-su, Che-kiang, Kiang-si, Hu-peh, and Ho-nan. Area, about 55,000 sq. m. It is watered by the rivers Yang-tse-kiang and Hwai-ho and their affluents. Population estimated at about 20,000,000. Capital, Ngan-king.

Ngan-king, n'gȧn'king', or Ngan-king-fu, the capital of the province of Ngan-hwei, China, 160 miles SW. of Nanking, on the Yang-tse-kiang. It is one of the interior ports opened to foreign commerce. Pop. estimated at 40,000.

Ngaundere, ngā-oon-dā'rā, the chief market of Adamawa, Africa, about 150 miles (direct) SSE. of Yola. Lat. 7° 25′ N.; lon. 13° 40′ E. Pop. estimated at 30,000.

Ngouça, or Ngusa, n'goo'sā', a walled town of the Algerian Sahara, oasis and 19 miles NE. of Wargla.

Ngunié, a river of French Congo, joins the Ogowai, on the S. in about lon. 10° 21′ E.

Nhill, a post-town of Victoria, Australia, 248 miles by rail NW. of Melbourne. Pop. about 1500.

Niagara, nī-ag'ą-rą (originally ne-ā-gā'rā, or rather nee-ā'gā'rā'), a river which forms part of the boundary between New York and Ontario, issues from the eastern end of Lake Erie at Buffalo, runs nearly northward, and, after a course of about 35 miles, enters Lake Ontario, having in this distance an aggregate fall of about 330 feet. It encloses several islands, the largest of which, called Grand Island, is nearly 10 miles long and 6 miles wide. About 4 miles below this island is the most celebrated cataract in the world. The river is divided by Goat Island, half a mile long, into two separate falls, the one on the Canadian side, which carries more than three-fourths of all the water, forming the Horseshoe Fall, with a perpendicular descent of 158 ft. and with a contour of 3010 ft. The height of the American Fall is 167 ft. and the width 1060 ft. The entire width of the river at Goat Island is 4770 ft.; the discharge over the falls is estimated to be 15,000,000 cubic feet per minute. The rock which crops out at the top of the cataract and forms the bed of the river is Niagara Limestone (Upper Silurian). Below the cataract the river flows in a gorge or chasm between perpendicular walls of rock which are nearly 250 ft. high, the width of the channel varying from 400 to 1200 ft. At the Whirlpool Rapids the stream is contracted to a width of 250–300 ft., and the convex waters are 20 ft. higher in the centre than on the edges. The river descends 104 ft. between the Falls and Lewiston, a distance of 6–7 miles. Several noble bridges cross the river below the cataract, and connect the railways which converge at the towns on the opposite banks of the river. Geologists concur in the opinion that the cataract was once 6 miles nearer to Lake Ontario than it is now, the view being held that before the existence of any cataract the waters of the upper great lakes were discharged through the Mississippi Valley. The cutting of the Niagara gorge is assumed to have taken place since the Glacial Epoch, and its age is variously estimated at from 10,000 to 40,000–50,000 years. The average annual recession of the falls is about 1½ ft. The energy of Niagara Falls is utilized for the production of electricity on an enormous scale. The land on both sides of the falls constitutes the New York State Reservation and the Queen Victoria Niagara Falls Park. The falls were discovered by Hennepin in 1678, but they appear in Sanson's Map of Canada, bearing date of 1657, under the name of Ongiara.

Niagara, a western county of New York, bordering on Canada, has an area of about 522 sq. m. It is bounded on the N. by Lake Ontario, on the S. by Tonawanda Creek, and on the W. by the Niagara River. It is traversed by the Erie Canal. The cataract of Niagara is on the W. border. Capital, Lockport. Pop. in 1890, 62,491; in 1900, 74,961.

Niagara, a post-village of Henderson co., Ky. Pop. 60.

Niagara, a township (town) of Niagara co., N.Y. Pop. in 1900, 1066.

Niagara, a post-village of Grand Forks co., N.Dak., on the Great Northern R. Pop. 150.

Niagara, a post-village of Marinette co., Wis. The banking point is Iron Mountain, Mich. Pop. 150.

Niagara (formerly Newark), or Niagara-on-the-Lake, a town and outport of Lincoln co., Ontario, on Lake Ontario, at the mouth of the Niagara River and on the Michigan Central R., 36 miles S. of Toronto. This is one of the oldest towns in the province and is a favorite resort during the summer months for pleasure- and health-seekers. In 1813 it was burned down by the American General McClure in his retreat from the north. Pop. in 1901, 1258.

Niagara Falls, a city of Niagara co., N.Y., is situated on the Niagara River, at the falls from which it takes its name, 22 miles NNW. of Buffalo and 13 miles S. of Lake Ontario, on the Erie, the New York Central and Hudson River and other railroads. It is the seat of Niagara University (Roman Catholic) and De Veaux College, and has paper- and other mills, reduction-works, manufactures of graphite, aluminium, carborundum, plated-ware, emery-wheels, hair-cloth, gas-machines, etc., and extensive electrolytic-works, which develop enormous horse-power from the cataract waters. Several bridges (suspension, cantilever, steel-arch) cross the river at this point. A New York State Reservation, including Prospect Park, was established here in 1885. Pop. in 1900, 19,457.

Niagara Falls, a banking town and port of entry of Welland co., Ontario, on the Niagara River, 2 miles below the falls, on the Michigan Central and other railroads. It has manufactures of carborundum, machine-shops, and wineries. The river is here crossed by two bridges. Pop. in 1901, 4244.

Niagara Falls Center, a post-village of Welland co., Ontario. The banking point is Niagara Falls, 1 mile distant. Pop. about 1000.

Niagara Falls South, a banking post-village of Welland co., Ontario, on the Michigan Central R., 2½ miles from the town of Niagara Falls. Pop. in 1901, 1458.

Niam-Niam, a powerful tribe of Africa, removed from the true Negro, inhabiting the region N. of the Ubanghi River and of the water-parting between the upper Nile and the Shari.

Niangua, a post-village of Webster co., Mo., on the St. Louis and San Francisco R., 31 miles NE. of Springfield. Pop. 100.

Niangua (or Big Niangua) River, Mo., rises in Webster co. and enters the Osage River about 2 miles above the village of Linn Creek.

Niantic, a post-village of New London co., Conn., on an inlet of the sea, called Niantic Bay, and on the New York, New Haven and Hartford R., 5 miles SW. of New London, its banking point. It has manufactures of cotton-machinery, fish-oil, etc., and granite-works. Pop. about 1100.

Niantic, a banking post-town of Macon co., Ill., on the Wabash R., 12 miles W. of Decatur. Pop. in 1900, 654.

Niantic, a post-village of Montgomery co., Pa. The banking point is Boyertown. Pop. about 300.

Niantic, a post-village of Washington co., R.I., on the Charles River and on the New York, New Haven and Hartford R., 10 miles NE. of Stonington, Conn. It has granite-quarries, etc. Pop. about 400.

Nias, or Pulo-Nias, poo'lo ne'ȧs', an island of the Malay Archipelago, on the W. coast of Sumatra. Lat. 1° 30′ N. It produces rice. On its E. coast is a village or town of the same name.

Nibbiano, nib-be-ā'no, a village and commune of Italy, 8 miles S. of Piacenza.

Nibe, nee'bā, a town of Denmark, in Jutland, 12 miles WSW. of Aalborg, on the Lim-Fjord. Pop. about 1500.

Nicæa, the ancient name of Nice, France.

Nicæa, a city of Asia Minor. See Isnik.

Nicaragua, nik-ar-ā'gwā, a republic of Central America, having W. the Pacific Ocean, E. the Caribbean Sea, N. the republic of Honduras (from which it is partly separated by the Segovia or Wanks River), and S. Costa Rica. Area, 49,200 sq. m. The Gulf of Fonseca, on the Pacific coast, separates it from Salvador. The Atlantic slope is largely a depressed alluvial plain. The surface rises in the interior to the heights of Segovia, Matagalpa, and Chontales, with elevations of 5000–7000 feet. Beyond these heights is the depression occupied by Lakes Nicaragua (surface about 106 ft. above the sea) and Managua and further northwestward by the Gulf of Fonseca. Between the lakes and the Pacific is a range of low elevations, which is the present water-parting (reduced to 153 feet a short distance S. of the town of Rivas) of the republic. On the Pacific side, closely associated with the depression occupied by the lakes, are a number of active and semiactive volcanoes, the most noted of which are Coseguina, in the NW., which had a paroxysmal eruption in 1835 (elevation, 3830 ft.), Telica, Viejo (5830 ft.), Las Pilas, Momotombo (in eruption in 1902 and 1905), Masaya, Ometepe, Zapatera, and Madera, the last three within the basin of Lake Nicaragua itself. There are numerous rivers, but none, except the San Juan, are of much importance for navigation. Lakes Nicaragua and Managua (or León), the latter discharging into the former through the Tipitapa, are respectively about 100 and 40 miles long.

The climate is, on the whole, healthy, though it varies in different sections. In the interior and mountainous parts the atmosphere is more dry and cool than on the coasts, where it is hot and more or less humid. The rainfall is in some parts excessive, being upward of 200 inches in an average year at Greytown and at other points of the Atlantic coast. Towards the Pacific it is reduced to 80 inches and less. The products are indigo, sugar, tobacco, coffee, cacao, bananas, and rubber; and corn, rice, and beans, part of the staple food of the people, are largely grown. The coffee crop (the principal crop) in 1902 was estimated at 30,000,000 pounds; the sugar export reached, in 1901, 4,000,000 pounds, while the banana export from the Bluefields region alone amounted to 1,303,845 bunches. The oranges and lemons are of fine quality. The minerals are chiefly gold, silver, and copper. The shipments of gold (in bar and dust) amounted in 1900 to 18,500 ounces.

There are few good roads in the interior and there are only about 175 miles of railroad in operation. Transit across the country from the Atlantic (Greytown) to the Pacific side is effected by the steamers on the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua and the continuing line of railroad on the west. The chief towns of Nicaragua are Managua (the present capital), León (the largest city, with about 45,000 inhabitants), Granada, Masaya, Chinandega, and Matagalpa. The chief ports or harbors are Greytown (San Juan del Norte), Bluefields, and Gracias-á-Dios, on the Atlantic side; and Corinto and San Juan del Sur, on the Pacific. The republic is administered by a president, elected for a term of 4 years, who is assisted by a council of ministers. The legislative power is vested in a Congress of a single house, elected by universal suffrage for a term of 2 years. Pop. in 1900 estimated at 500,000, mainly composed of Indians, mulattoes, and negroes. Only a small percentage are pure whites. The Europeans probably do not exceed 1200. After belonging to Spain for 3 centuries, Nicaragua formed part of the Confederation of Central America from 1823 till its dissolution in 1839, since which time it has been an independent republic. For the projected Nicaragua Canal, see NICARAGUA, LAKE.

Nicaragua, a town of the republic of Nicaragua. See RIVAS.

Nicaragua, Lake (Sp. Lago de Nicaragua, lä'go dä ne-kä-rä'gwä), an extensive sheet of water in the republic of Nicaragua, Central America, 100 miles long from NW. to SE.; greatest breadth, 45 miles. It lies about 106 feet above sea-level and is separated from the Pacific Ocean by a strip of land only 13 miles wide. The river San Juan flows from its SE. extremity into the Caribbean Sea, and at its NW. extremity it is connected with the smaller lake of Managua, or León (lying 30 ft. higher), by the river Tipitapa. The greatest depth is about 200 ft. Waterfowl and excellent fish are abundant; alligators are numerous. It contains some islands and several groups of islets, mostly of volcanic origin. Of the former, Zapatera, Ometepe, and Madera are the largest. Zapatera is mountainous, rising to a height of nearly 2000 ft. Ometepe is occupied by an industrious race of Indians, who raise maize, etc., and possess some cattle. Madera is joined to Ometepe by a low neck of land, which is frequently overflowed. On these islands are the twin volcanoes of Alta Gracia and Madera, both of them about 5000 ft. in height. The islets are generally conical in shape and seldom exceed 3 or 4 acres in area. They are covered with verdure and on many of them are cultivated patches of ground. Numerous relics of antiquity have been found about the lake, consisting of huge, elaborately sculptured stones, massive idols, and figures of monstrous animals. The material is commonly black basalt and the cutting exhibits great freedom and skill. Lake Nicaragua has long been thought of in connection with the construction of an interoceanic canal and numerous surveys looking to the execution of this project have been made at different times. The most recent surveys established a line (now superseded by the Panama route) having a total length of 185 miles, with the partial use and canalization of the San Juan River, and a cut extending from the SW. coast to Brito on the Pacific. The chief town on the banks of the lake is Granada.

Nicaria, or Nikaria, ne-kä-ree'ä (anc. Ica'ria), an island of the Grecian Archipelago, belonging to Turkey, 12 miles W. of Samos. Area, 50 sq. m. Nice, neess (It. Nizza, nit'sä; anc. Nicæ'a), an episcopal city and seaport of France, capital of the department of Alpes-Maritimes, previous to 1860 part of the kingdom of Sardinia, situated on the Mediterranean, at the mouth of the Paillon, 84 miles NE. of Toulon. Lat. of observatory, 43° 43′ 16″ N.; lon. 7° 18′ 4″ E. It is beautifully situated in a small plain, which it almost covers, at the foot of the Maritime Alps, and its site is well guarded by a line of fortifications. On the N. and the E. the mountains enclose it in the form of an amphitheatre. The city is divided into the old and the new town, the latter, to the W. of the Paillon, being generally designated the Strangers' Quarter. The streets of the former are in the main crooked and narrow, although replaced near the shore by better ones. In the new city there are many attractive squares and boulevards, flanked by handsome private and public edifices. The Place Masséna and Place du Casino (on which is the stately Casino Municipal) are the focal points of the city's social life, which displays itself along the Jardin Public, the superb Promenade des Anglais (constructed by the English in 1822–24), the Jetée-Promenade, and the Boulevard du Midi. Nice has a cathedral, several theatres, hospitals, a public library, municipal museum, observatory, etc. It has some silk-, cotton- and paper-industries, many oil-mills, and manufactures of tobacco, leather, soap, wine, essences, inlaid work, straw hats, etc. Floriculture is largely carried on and there is an extensive trade in southern fruits. The harbor or port (of Lympia) lies three-fourths of a mile E. of the Paillon; it is small and open to the SE. Nice is noted for its mild, equable, and salubrious climate (average winter temperature 49°) and is a favorite winter-resort of foreigners, whose numbers are estimated at from 10,000 to 15,000 annually. It was ceded, with some adjacent territory, by Victor Emmanuel to France in 1860. Pop. in 1901, 78,480 (commune, 105,109).

Niger, nī'jẹr, or Quor'ra, written also Kwara and Kowara, called Joliba (jol'e-bå) in the upper part of its course, a great river of western Africa, and after the Nile and the Congo the largest river of the African continent, rises in the country of the Mandingos, in about lat. 8° 40′ N., lon. 10° 30′ W., and, flowing N. and NE. towards the Sahara, afterwards turns SE. and S. and enters the sea through many mouths in the Bight of Benin. Towards its source it is called the Tembi,—that is, "water," in the Kisse language,—but lower down, in Bambarra, it is the Babaa, "Great River," or Joliba,—that is, the river of the Joli, or Red Men, who are the inhabitants of Joli-nkendu, or Jallon-kandu (Red Man's Land). It becomes navigable for steamers at Bammaku, 135 miles above Segu, in Bambarra. Lower down, after passing Sansandig, it enters a level country and divides into several arms enclosing extensive islands, opposite one of which is Jenne (or properly Ginewa), a great emporium of Negroland, from which is derived the name Guinea. The river then enters a territory in which the Fulahs (or Felletah) are the rulers, within whose domain it is called Issa. In its course down to Jenne the Joliba receives several accessions from the S. Farther on it turns northward, crossing Debo (or Blackwater) Lake, where it receives the Bakhoi on the right. At Kabra (or Kabara), the port of Timbuktu, it reaches nearly its highest latitude (about 17° 20′ N.); it (now known as Mayo Balleo) then runs E. along the desert towards the frontiers of Houssa (Hausa).

In the Houssa country the great river is known as the Gulbi-nkowara,—that is, the "River Kwara" (or Kowara),—and farther S., in Nupé (or Nyffé), where it is often a league wide or more, it is entitled the sea (or lake) of Nupé (or Kwara). A very active commerce here animates the broad waters of the Quorra. Through Houssa and Nupé flow several streams from the heights which divide those countries from Bornu. Opposite Lokoja, in about lat. 7° 46′ N., the Niger unites with its chief (left) tributary, the Benue (or Chadda), a navigable stream from Adamawa. The united stream then flows S. by W., forming the eastern boundary of Yoruba. In part of this course it is called Ujimini Fufu (or White Water), the Benue being styled Ujimini Dudu (or Black Water). The delta of the Niger commences near Abo, about 80 miles from the sea. It has numerous mouths, the chief of which are the Nun (the navigable mouth), the Forcado, and the Bonny. The whole course of the great river from its source to the mouth of the Nun is about 2500 miles. It is regularly traversed for many miles by British steamers. From about lat. 11° 30′ N. and lon. 4° E. the course of the stream is almost wholly in Nigeria. The scenery near the delta is of the wildest forest character and largely of mangrove swamp. The course of the Niger was a riddle to geographers until it was revealed by the explorations of Mungo Park, Clapperton and Denham, and Lander between 1795 and 1830.

Nigeria, a vast region of west-central Africa, within the British sphere of influence, comprising, since 1900, the entire territory that was formerly administered by the Royal Niger Company (which constituted about four-fifths of the area of the present region), the region of the Niger Coast Protectorate and the Lagos Protectorate. Most of it lies between the Gulf of Guinea on the S. and lat. 14° N., and between lon. 3° and 13° E. (Lake Chad). It abuts upon Dahomey and the French Military Territories in the W. and N. and upon German Kamerun in the SE. A considerable portion of the courses of the Niger and of its chief tributary, the Benue, lies in this region, the area of which is roughly estimated at 400,000 sq. m., with a population of perhaps not less than 20,000,000. It comprises a vast number of native states, kingdoms, or empires, such as Yoruba, Sokoto, Gando, Bornu, etc., and many large native towns (Kano, Bida, Ilorin, Yakoba). A large part of the region is heavily forested and yields gums and balsams of various kinds, palm oil and kernels, ivory, india-rubber, camwood, indigo, etc. Some mineral deposits have been located. For administrative purposes the region is divided into Northern Nigeria (covering about 320,000 sq. m.), with the seat of the high commissioner at Zungeru (until recently at Jebba), and Southern Nigeria, with the seat of government at Old Calabar.

Niksar, nik'sar' (anc. Neocæsarea; originally, Cabira), a town of Asia Minor, in the vilayet of Sivas, 30 miles NE. of Tokat, on the route to Erzerum. It has a citadel. The place is remarkable for the Roman and Byzantine remains found in and about it. Pop. about 4000.

Nikshitch, a town of Montenegro, 34 miles NE. of Cattaro (Dalmatia). It occupies a strong position on an isolated hill, rising above the valley of the Zeta. It was wrested by the Montenegrins from the Turks in 1877. Pop. about 3500.

Nile (Arab. Bahr-Nil, bȧн'r neel; anc. Nilus), the largest river of Africa, the longest in the world after the Missouri-Mississippi, and the most celebrated, has its headwaters in the Kagera (or Alexandra Nile), a small stream (known in its furthest part as the Nyavarongo) which rises in the mountains at the NE. extremity of Lake Tanganyika, in about lat. 3° S. and lon. 29° 30′ E., and flows into the western side of the Victoria Lake (Victoria Nyanza, elevation about 3800 feet). Emerging from this lake as the Victoria (or Somerset) Nile, it passes through the Gita and Kioga lakes, is precipitated over the Murchison Falls (120 ft.), and enters the Albert Lake (Albert Nyanza), which receives the discharge of the Semliki River coming from Lake Albert Edward, and which is the second "great basin" of the river. From this body of water the Nile passes out as the Bahr-el-Jebel, and after a moderate distance leaves the central African plateau, and enters into the grass and swamp land of the eastern Sudan, where it receives from the W. the Bahr-el-Ghazal or Gazelle River. Beyond this point and as far as the junction with the Bahr-el-Azrek (or Blue Nile), just below Khartum, the stream is known as the Bahr-el-Abiad, the White Nile, so named from the light tint of its waters. Below this point, in lat. 15° 37′ N., the united stream is known as the Nile. It receives its last tributary, the Atbara (anc. Astab'oras), in lat. 17° 42′ N., at the N. extremity of the peninsula of Atbara (sometimes called the Island of Meroë), and thence flows N. without any accession through 14 degrees of latitude, or, following its windings, at least 1300 miles, to the sea. Below its junction with the Atbara it has on the W. the desert of Bahiuda and on the E. Berber. In the plains of Dongola the river forms several islands of great extent. Entering Egypt near Wadi-Halfa, it descends the second cataract, and about 250 miles farther passes over the final cataract (first in ascending) at Syene (or Assuan), in lat. 24° 5′ N. About lat. 26° 30′ N. a narrow lateral channel diverges from the Nile on the left, known as Bahr-Yusuf (Joseph's River or Joseph's Canal), which flows parallel with the river for some hundreds of miles, discharging its waters in part into the depression of the Fayum and conveying them in part back again to the Nile. In lat. 30° 15′ N. the Nile divides into two branches, leading respectively to Rosetta (Rashid), in the W., and Damietta (Damiat), in the E., entering the sea, after traversing the whole of Egypt, in about lat. 31° 35′ N. From the influx of the Bahr-el-Azrek to its delta the basin of the Nile, varying in breadth, is formed by two parallel chains of mountains. Its banks are generally elevated in Nubia, rising to 1000 ft. or more; they are less so in middle Egypt, and absolutely flat in the delta. From Assuan to the sea the average fall is 2 inches to the mile, and the mean velocity is about 3 miles an hour. At the delta its waters spread out into numerous streams in the form of a triangle, whose base extends over a space of 120 miles, between the Rosetta branch and the Damietta branch. The ordinary width of the Nile in Egypt above the delta is about 700 yards, but it enlarges in a few places to 1100 yards. The branches through the delta are so shallow in the dry season that vessels exceeding 40 tons' burden cannot pass through them. The Mahmudiyeh Canal connects the Rosetta arm of the Nile with Alexandria. For a great distance in its course through the eastern Sudan the Nile is obstructed by vast masses of floating vegetable matter, tangled and intermatted so as to oppose a barrier to the passage of vessels. Great efforts have been made of late to break up these obstructions, which are known as Sudds.

As rain scarcely ever falls in the valley of the Nile from the 18th to nearly the 30th parallel of latitude, and very scantily even lower down, the river owes its supplies wholly to the copious rains of the countries wherein it rises. It begins to increase in June, attains its greatest height about the autumnal equinox, and then subsides as gradually as it rose. The ordinary rise at Cairo is about 40 feet. During the flood a great portion of the delta and of the valley of Egypt higher up is inundated. In Sennaar also and Dongola extensive tracts are watered immediately by the river, but in general its banks above Egypt are irrigated by means of the water-wheel. The Nile is the only large African river that discharges its waters into the Mediterranean.

The alluvium with which the Nile is always charged, especially during the inundation, is chiefly due to the Bahr-el-Azrek, which brings down the decayed vegetable matter and the degraded volcanic rocks from Abyssinia that make the Nile the great fertilizer of Egypt. The Nile is navigable for the greater part of its length, the principal obstructions being found at Abu-Hammed (near the foot of the fifth cataract), and Wadi-Halfa (the foot of the second cataract). Large vessels ascend to Assuan (now passed by a navigable canal, with locks, 1¼ miles long), where the first cataract, about 3 miles in length and having a fall of 16 feet, begins. In the second cataract the river falls 216 feet in 125 miles. In the course between Khartum (about 50 miles above the sixth cataract) and Assuan, a distance of 1170 miles, the river falls 960 feet. The distances, in miles, measured along the windings of the Nile from the Damietta mouth, are: to Cairo 164, Siut 430, Keneh 581, Assuan 774, first cataract 779, Derr 933, second cataract 1029, third cataract 1250, fourth cataract 1484, fifth cataract 1679, Atbara River 1739, sixth cataract 1888, mouth of the Bahr-el-Azrek 1948, Kak 2428, Bahr-el-Ghazal 2658, Gondokoro 3258, cataract of Meru 3361, Karuma Falls 3576, Ripon Falls 3766; and to the source of the principal feeder of the Victoria Nyanza on the W. 4100 miles. Works looking to the regulation and storage of the waters of the Nile have been constructed on the vastest scale. They comprise the barrage constructed by Mehemet Ali (15 miles NW. of Cairo), the colossal dam (averaging 60 feet in height and penetrated by 180 openings) built over the river near Assuan, and the barrage at Siut (Assiut). The holding or impounding capacity of the Assuan reservoir is estimated to be 37,500,000,000 cubic feet, which will serve as an enormous reserve to hundreds of thousands of acres of land requiring irrigation. A railway follows the course of the Nile (departing from it for a comparatively short stretch below Abu-Hammed) from the sea to Khartum. The scenery of the Nile, especially where its valley is hemmed in by great rock masses, is strikingly beautiful. The river, which was sacred to the ancient Egyptians, presents a succession of the most stupendous monuments of antiquity. The great problem of the sources of the Nile was settled by the discoveries of Burton, Speke, and Baker (1858–64) and the subsequent explorations of Livingstone and Stanley. See Albert Nyanza, Victoria Nyanza, etc.

Nile, a post-village of Allegany co., N.Y., about 28 miles WSW. of Hornellsville. Pop. 200.

Nimeguen, nim'ę-ghĕn (Dutch, Nijmegen, nī'mā'ghęn; Ger. Nimwegen, nim'wā'ghęn; anc. Noviom'agus), a fortified town of the Netherlands, in Gelderland, on the Waal, 9½ miles S. of Arnhem, near the Prussian frontier. It consists in great part of crooked streets clambering up steep hill-sides, but has open squares, fine pleasure-grounds, and a broad promenade, recently laid out on the site of the old fortifications. It was an important place in the time of the Carlovingian emperors, figuring as an imperial residence, was a free imperial city and a member of the Hanseatic League in the later Middle Ages, and has preserved some interesting memorials of its past. Among the notable edifices are the venerable church of St. Stephen, known as the Great Church; the Renaissance town-hall, adorned with statues of German emperors and containing a valuable museum of antiquities; the Weigh House; a mediæval sixteen-sided chapel, built on the site of a Carlovingian structure; and the Belvedere, commanding a fine view of the charming surroundings. In one of the parks may be seen the vestiges of a Carlovingian palace. Nimeguen is noted for its white beer. There are manufactures of cigars, metallic wares, eau de cologne, etc. The town has an active trade in the products of the region. France concluded treaties of peace with Holland and Spain at Nimeguen in 1678 and a treaty with the German Empire in 1679. Pop. in 1900, 42,756.

Nimes, or Nismes, neem (anc. Nemau'sus), a town of France, capital of the department of Gard, 30 miles NE. of Montpellier. The older part is irregularly built; the modern is well laid out in straight and spacious streets and boulevards (Avenue Feuchères, Boulevard de la République, Boulevard Gambetta). It has a venerable cathedral (St. Castor), built in various styles; an old citadel, now used as a central prison; a fine square (or Esplanade), adorned with a splendid fountain; and a number of imposing or attractive public buildings,—prefecture, Palais de Justice, Hôtel-Dieu (public hospital), theatres, etc. No town in France has so many fine Roman remains; the most remarkable of these are the amphitheatre (les Arènes), 437 feet long, 332 ft. broad, and 70 ft. high; the beautiful Corinthian temple, called the Maison-Carrée (Square House), which is restored and the interior of which serves for a museum of antiquities; the so-called Temple of Diana; and the Tour Magne, an octagonal ruin, 90 ft. in height. Ten miles to the NE. are the remains of a magnificent aqueduct, called the Pont-du-Gard. Nîmes possesses a school of fine arts, a picture gallery, a public library of upward of 80,000 volumes, a museum of natural history, and schools of design, music, etc. It is extensively engaged in the textile industry, the leading product being silk, and the iron- and leather-industries are also represented. It has an important trade in wine, raw silk, etc. Nîmes is a very ancient town and under the Romans was one of the most important cities of Gaul. It was an important Huguenot centre and suffered much during the religious wars. About one-fourth of the inhabitants are Calvinists. Pop. in 1901, 72,479 (commune, 80,605).

Nin'eveh (L. Ninus; Gr. Νίνος, Ninŏs), a city of antiquity, the later capital of the Assyrian Empire, the ruins of which are found on the left bank of the Tigris, opposite the town of Mosul. The principal mounds of ruins are those of Koyunjik and Nebi Yunus. In the vicinity are the mounds of Khorsabad and Nimrud, the latter containing the ruins of Calah. The discoveries which have brought to light the seats of the Assyrian monarchs and the countless relics of Assyrian civilization were inaugurated by Botta in 1842. In 1845 Layard began his excavations which yielded extraordinary results. He had successors in Hormuzd Rassam, George Smith, and others. Vast royal palaces (with remarkable decorations), a great royal library (inscriptions on innumerable tablets), colossal sculptured figures, and an endless array of ornaments, seals, and small objects of every kind have been unearthed. The cuneiform inscriptions have been deciphered and the annals of Assyria reconstructed from these records. The British Museum has been made the receptacle of the movable relics. The destruction of Nineveh by the Medes and Babylonians took place about 607 B.C. (perhaps a little earlier).

Nineveh, a post-village of Johnson co., Ind., about 30 miles S. of Indianapolis. Pop. about 400.

Normandy (Fr. Normandie, nor'mŏN^{n}'dee'; L. Norman'nia), an ancient province of France, bounded N. and W. by the English Channel and traversed in its eastern portion by the Seine. Area, about 10,500 sq. m. It was divided into Upper Normandy, in the E., and Lower Normandy, in the centre, S., and W. The capital of the former was Rouen, which was the capital of all Normandy, and that of the latter was Caen. Normandy consists of fertile plateaus. In the southeast there is a broken and very picturesque region. Normandy has fine pastures and is noted for its dairy produce and apples. Among the towns on the coast of Normandy are Dieppe, Havre, Honfleur, Harfleur, Cherbourg, and Granville. Trouville is the principal seabathing resort. The region derives its name from the Northmen (Normans), who descended upon it in the ninth century and were formally granted possession by the French king about 911. William the Conqueror, duke of Normandy, conquered England in 1066. The duchy was wrested from England and united to France by Philip Augustus in 1202–04. It was again in the hands of the English in the first half of the fifteenth century, being finally reconquered by the French in 1449–50. Simultaneously with the conquest of England the Normans established their sway in southern Italy and Sicily, where an independent kingdom was founded. Normandy is now divided into the departments of Seine-Inférieure, Eure, Calvados, Manche, and Orne.

North Cameron, a post-station of Steuben co., N.Y., 6 miles SSW. of Bath.

North Canaan, a township (town) of Litchfield co., Conn., has beds of iron-ore. Pop. in 1900, 1803.

North Canara (or Kanara, kân'â-râ), the southernmost district of the Bombay presidency, bounded W. by the Arabian Sea. Capital, Karwar.

North Canton, a post-village of Hartford co., Conn., about 17 miles NW. of Hartford. Pop. about 175.

North, Cape, a promontory forming, with the Knivskjärodde (or knife-skerry-point), the northernmost point of Europe, and situated on the N. extremity of the island of Magerö, which is separated from the main-land of Norway by a narrow channel. Lat. 71° 11′ 40″ N.; lon. 25° 46′ E. It consists of a long row of precipitous rocks jutting out into the sea and terminating above, partly in pyramidal peaks and partly in a table-land. Height, 968 feet.

North (or Sievernoi, se-â'vĕr-noi'), Cape, a headland on the N. coast of Siberia. Lat. 68° 56′ N.; lon. 179° 51′ E.

North, Cape, the NE. extremity of the island of Cape Breton. Lat. 47° 4′ N.; lon. 60° 21′ W.

North, Cape, on the N. coast of Prince Edward Island, Gulf of St. Lawrence. Lat. 47° 6′ N.; lon. 63° 57′ W.

North, Cape (Port. Cabo do Norte, kâ'bo do nor'tâ), South America, on the N. coast of Brazil, at the northernmost mouth of the Amazon.

North, or O'too' (Otou), Cape, the N. extremity of New Zealand.

Northcape, a post-village of Racine co., Wis., 8 miles W. of Franksville station. Pop. 80.

North Carmel, a post-village of Penobscot co., Me., 2 miles N. of Carmel and about 13 miles W. by N. of Bangor. Pop. 200.

North Carolina, a south Atlantic state of the American Union, bounded N. by Virginia, E. and SE. by the Atlantic Ocean, S. by South Carolina and Georgia, and W. by Tennessee. It lies between 33° 50′ and 36° 33′ N. lat. Its greatest length, E. and W., is 490 miles; extreme breadth, 185 miles. Area of the land-surface, 48,580 sq. m.; of the appertaining waters, 3670 sq. m.

Face of the Country.—Along the W. border runs the Great Smoky (or Iron) Mountain range; and at a considerable distance southeastward runs, in a nearly parallel course, what is here the main chain of the Alleghanies, continuous northeastward with the Blue Ridge of Virginia. Between these ridges there are various parallel, transverse, and scattered ranges and groups of mountains rising from a plateau elevated from 3500 to 4000 feet. Of these the highest in the state, or in any part of the Appalachian system, are the Black Mountains, of which Mitchell's Peak

(or Black Dome) attains the height of 6711 ft. It is the loftiest summit of the Union E. of the Rocky Mountains. Southwestward are the Bald, Unaka, Cowse, and other ranges; and along the South Carolina boundary-line the Blue Ridge bends westward and for some distance marks the limit of the state. A considerable number of the summits of the state exceed 6000 ft. in height. Among these are Clingman Dome, on the Tennessee border, 6619 ft.; Mount Gibbs, 6591 ft.; Hairy Bear, 6681 ft.; Cattail Peak, 6611 ft.; Mount Buckley, 6599 ft.; and Balsam Cone, 6671 ft. The Blue Ridge declines eastwardly into an elevated tract, W. of the Catawba and Yadkin rivers, and this plateau supports some mountain-outliers and broken hills. The mountain country is wonderfully picturesque and healthful and affords good grazing- and corn-land, with much hard timber. Next eastward lies the midland (or Piedmont) section, with its varied surface and excellent soils, adapted to the growth of cotton, tobacco, and the cereals. The coast-lands, extending back for 80–100 or 150 miles, form the pine country, where the long-leaf pine affords abundance of timber and naval stores. The region includes some 3,000,000 acres of swamps, of which the Great and Little Dismal, Alligator, Angola, Green, and Holly Shelter swamps are among the most extensive. This tract also contains much productive land.

Coast-line, Rivers, etc.—A remarkable range or rampart, consisting of low sand-islands, fences the coast proper of North Carolina, cutting off its shallow lagoons and tranquil sounds from the open sea. These islands present three principal capes,—Hatteras, Lookout, and Fear,—whose outlying shoals render navigation extremely dangerous. Onslow and Raleigh bays are the intervals between the three capes. Within the sand-rampart are Pamlico, Albemarle, and Currituck sounds, shallow, brackish, and nearly tideless expanses of water, connected with the sea through a few inlets, of which Ocracoke and Hatteras inlets are the principal. The ports of entry are Wilmington, Newbern, Beaufort, and Elizabeth City. Currituck Sound communicates with Norfolk, Va., through the Dismal Swamp Canal, which is navigated by steamers. The Cape Fear River, formed by the Dan and the Haw, the Roanoke and the Neuse, and the Chowan, Tar, and Pamlico offer together several hundred miles of navigable waters. The Yadkin becomes in South Carolina the Great Pedee, the Catawba becomes the Wateree, and the Broad the Congaree. In the W. the Hiawassee, Tuckasegee, and French Broad break through the mountain-wall of the state and enter Tennessee.

Objects of interest to tourists are very numerous. Among them are Mitchell's Peak; the deep Swannana (Swananoa) Gap; Catawba Falls; Pilot, Roan, Grandfather's, Grandmother's, Bald, and King's mountains, the last-named partly in South Carolina; the gorge of the French Broad River; the remarkable remains of prehistoric aboriginal life, such as burial-fields, copper-mines, mounds, etc.; the Chimneys, Painted Rock, Blowing Rock (with its enormous precipice), and the warm springs of Buncombe co.

Geology, Minerals.—The mountain-region and most of the middle section are underlaid by richly metalliferous Azoic strata. Eastward they are bounded by a narrow but irregular belt of the Cambrian (Silurian), which crosses the state, running from the neighborhood of Oxford and Roxboro on the NE. to that of Monroe and Rockingham on the SW. Along the eastern side of this belt runs a narrow strip of the Triassic, interesting for its remarkable beds of coal, developed chiefly in the valley of the navigable Deep River. Besides this there lies SW. of Danville, Va., another Triassic region, also containing coal. The coals of the Deep River bed are of every grade, from perfect graphite and excellent anthracite to the bituminous gas-coal and the half-bituminous smiths' coal. Coal-mining, however, has not yet attained large proportions. The total product of the state in 1903 was 17,309 short tons, valued at $25,300. Most of the lower, midland, and coast belts are of Tertiary and Quaternary age, with some strips where the Cretaceous is laid bare in the river-valleys. The mineral wealth of North Carolina is considerable, but the product of the mines is restricted. Gold, which is mined chiefly in Cabarrus, Mecklenburg, Lincoln, and Rowan cos., was wrought in 1903 to the extent of 3411 fine ounces, valued at $70,500; silver, 11,000 fine ounces, valued at $5940; iron (brown hematite and magnetite), 75,592 long tons, valued at $99,885. Lead, copper, and zinc are also mined and smelted, and platinum, palladium, and diamonds have been found sparingly. Mica is profitably mined in Mitchell, Cleveland, and Yancey cos. Alum, graphite, jade, buhrstone, granite, kaolin, limestone, whetstone, grindstone, soapstone, and corundum are found, the latter in special abundance.

Climate, Natural Products, etc.—The mountain-country has a delightful summer and autumnal climate and a bracing and not too severe winter, and has become a resort for health and pleasure (Asheville, etc.). Its scenery is striking and richly varied, and its trout and game attract the angler and sportsman. In this region, part of which has sometimes been designated the "Land of the Sky," the eye is delighted with a rich and dense vegetation (of laurel, magnolia, rhododendron, etc.), which in some parts covers the mountains to their summits. The coast-region has a damp and warm summer climate and near the swamps fevers and catarrhal diseases prevail, although the dry pine woods are exceptionally healthful and are especially free from pulmonary complaints. The middle section is generally healthful also, and combines the characters of the other two regions. The normal maximum temperature for the lower regions of the state is about 100°; and the minimum about 10°. The average annual rainfall for the state is about 53 inches. Besides the valued pine (long-leaf and loblolly pines) of the low region, we may mention the cypress, cedar, oak, hickory, ash, walnut, and other kinds of excellent timber which the state affords. The native fruits include the persimmon, the scuppernong and other excellent wild grapes, the Chickasaw plum, and the cranberry, which is gathered for export. Large amounts of ginseng, snake-root, pink-root, yellow jessamine, false vanilla, and other wild medicinal and aromatic herbs are marketed from North Carolina. Abundant in this state is the interesting Dionæa (or Venus's fly-trap). Here grows the yawpon (or yupon), a kind of holly, closely kindred to Paraguay tea. Its leaves are very commonly employed as a substitute for tea, and of it the Indians made their nauseous osceola (or black drink). The forests afford great amounts of pine timber and spars for the general market, and yield a large share of the world's supply of naval stores, including rosin, oil of turpentine, raw turpentine, tar, and pitch. Among the native animals are deer, bears, wolves, raccoons, opossums, etc. In the SE. the alligator is seen. Of venomous serpents the state has the rattlesnake, cotton-mouth, moccasin, and some species of Elaps.

Agriculture.—The culture of cotton has latterly extended northward and westward in this state, and the cotton-product of North Carolina bears an exceptionally high character in the market. The crop of commercial cotton, for the year 1900, was 459,707 bales. All parts of the state afford much maize. Tobacco has long been one of the leading products. Sweet potatoes are largely grown. Spring market vegetables are quite extensively raised for sale in the northern cities. Rice does well in the swamps, especially southeastward. Apples, peaches, pears, and grapes thrive exceedingly well. Dried fruits are becoming a staple of export. The cultivation of the vine has become a profitable occupation, and honey and beeswax form a considerable source of revenue in the eastern district, and in the production of peanuts the state holds third place among the states of the Union. The leading agricultural crops in 1900 were: corn, 29,790,180 bushels; wheat, 5,960,803 bushels; oats, 5,046,117 bushels; rye, 411,287 bushels; potatoes, 1,063,474 bushels; and hay, 176,680 tons. Stock-raising is the leading pursuit in the W. The quantity of washed and unwashed wool obtained from the wool-clip of 1900, was 1,117,485 pounds.

Commerce, Fisheries, Manufactures.—North Carolina exports, coastwise and to foreign countries, large quantities of naval stores, lumber and other forest products, cotton, tobacco, flour, and fish. The sounds and rivers give a large annual catch of shad, herring (or alewives), and bass (or rock); and the mullet, sheepshead, and bluefish (or taylor) are also abundantly taken. The leading manufacturing industries of the state are the manufacture of cotton goods, the sawing of lumber, and the production of rosin, tar, pitch, turpentine-oil, cotton-seed oil (largely used in the making of fertilizers), tobacco, and flour. The value of the cotton product in 1900 was $28,372,798; while the lumber and timber product for the same period was valued at $14,862,593, and that of tobacco at $13,620,816. Metallurgical and mining operations are carried on to some extent. Important iron-smelting works were in operation here during the war of 1861–65, producing metal of peculiar excellence. Carriage- and car-making, cooperage, tanning, and quite a varied manufacturing industry are carried on in and near some of the larger towns.

Education.—Among the important institutions of learning are the University of North Carolina, at Chapel Hill; North Carolina College (Lutheran), at Mt. Pleasant; the State College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts; Davidson College, at Davidson; Trinity College (Methodist Episcopal), at Durham; Guilford College (Friends), at Guilford College; and St. Mary's College (Roman Catholic), at Belmont. The higher institutions for colored are Shaw University, at Raleigh; the Agricultural and Mechanical College, at Greensboro; Biddle University, at Charlotte; and Livingstone College, at Salisbury.

Railroads.—In 1850 this state had 283 miles of railroad; in 1860, 937 miles; in 1870, 1178 miles; in 1880, 1499 miles; in 1890, 3128 miles; and in 1900, 3696 miles.

The counties are 97 in number, to wit: Alamance, Alexander, Alleghany, Anson, Ashe, Beaufort, Bertie, Bladen, Brunswick, Buncombe, Burke, Cabarrus, Caldwell, Camden, Carteret, Caswell, Catawba, Chatham, Cherokee, Chowan, Clay, Cleveland, Columbus, Craven, Cumberland, Currituck, Dare, Davidson, Davie, Duplin, Durham, Edgecombe, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Gates, Graham, Granville, Green, Guilford, Halifax, Harnett, Haywood, Henderson, Hertford, Hyde, Iredell, Jackson, Johnston, Jones, Lenoir, Lincoln, McDowell, Macon, Madison, Martin, Mecklenburg, Mitchell, Montgomery, Moore, Nash, New Hanover, Northampton, Onslow, Orange, Pamlico, Pasquotank, Pender, Perquimans, Person, Pitt, Polk, Randolph, Richmond, Robeson, Rockingham, Rowan, Rutherford, Sampson, Scotland, Stanley, Stokes, Surry, Swain, Transylvania, Tyrrel, Union, Vance, Wake, Warren, Washington, Watauga, Wayne, Wilkes, Wilson, Yadkin, and Yancey.

The principal towns and cities in 1900 were Wilmington, the principal seaport (pop. 20,976); Charlotte (18,091); Asheville (14,694); Raleigh, the capital (13,643); Greensboro (10,035); Winston (10,008); Concord (7910); Durham, Elizabeth City, Salisbury, and Newbern.

Government, etc.—The governor and state officers are chosen for a term of 4 years. The legislature consists of a senate and a house of representatives, the members of each being elected for 2 years. The state has 10 representatives in the lower house of Congress.

The population in 1790 was 393,751; in 1800, 487,103; in 1810, 555,500; in 1820, 638,829; in 1830, 737,987; in 1840, 753,419; in 1850, 869,039; in 1860, 992,622, of whom 629,942 were whites, 331,059 slaves, and 30,463 free colored; in 1870, 1,071,361; in 1880, 1,399,750; in 1890, 1,617,947; in 1900, 1,893,810, of whom 624,469 were colored. The foreign-born population in 1900 was only 4492. The people were originally of English stock, with large subsequent additions of Scotch-Irish and Highland-Scotch elements.

History.—In 1585 and 1587 Raleigh planted colonies upon Roanoke Island, but the first permanent settlements were made by Virginians near the northern border. In 1663 the province of Carolina was granted by Charles II. to a number of lords proprietors. It was divided into two parts, North Carolina and South Carolina. The philosopher Locke devised for Carolina a fantastic form of government, with an aristocracy of landgraves and caciques, and for a time this was in partial operation. Some of the Indian tribes (Corees, Tuscaroras, Nottoways, etc., principally of Iroquois stock) attacked the colonists, but in 1712 the greater part were subdued, and the Tuscaroras at once went northward and joined the Five (thenceforward Six) Nations in the New York province. In 1729 North Carolina became a separate royal province. The colony took an early stand for independence and became one of the thirteen original states of the Union. In 1861 a state convention passed an ordinance of secession. The most important operations in this state during the Civil War were at Roanoke Island, Newbern, Fort Fisher, Averysboro, and Bentonville. It was the last important battle-ground in the struggle, which was virtually closed with the surrender of General Johnston to Sherman, on April 26, 1865, at Durham's Station. The reconstruction of the state was completed in 1868.

North Carrollton, a banking post-town of Carroll co., Miss. Pop. in 1900, 189.

North Carver, a post-village of Plymouth co., Mass., about 16 miles E. of Taunton. Pop. 275.

North Castine (kas-teen'), a post-village of Hancock co., Me., on the E. side of Penobscot Bay, about 30 miles S. of Bangor. Pop. 100.

Northcastle, a post-hamlet in Northcastle township (town), Westchester co., N.Y., about 38 miles NNE. of New York city. Pop. of the town in 1900, 1471.

North Cedar, a post-village of Jefferson co., Kan.

North Charleroi, a borough of Washington co., Pa., formerly a part of Fallowfield township. Pop. in 1900, 425.

North Charlestown, a post-village of Sullivan co., N.H., on the Connecticut River and on the Central Vermont R., 6½ miles SSW. of Claremont. Pop. 75.

North Chatham, a post-village of Barnstable co., Mass., on Pleasant Bay, near the sea, about 54 miles E. of New Bedford. Pop. 100.

North Chatham, a post-station of Carroll co., N.H., about 40 miles N. of Ossipee.

North Chatham, a post-village of Columbia co., N.Y., on Kinderhook Creek, about 16 miles SSE. of Albany, on the Albany and Hudson R. Pop. 150.

North Chelmsford, a post-village of Middlesex co., Mass., on the Merrimac River and on the Boston and Maine R., 3 miles W. of Lowell.

North Chemung, a post-village of Chemung co., N.Y. The banking point is Elmira. Pop. 150.

North Chester, a post-hamlet of Hampden co., Mass., on the Middle Branch of the Westfield River, 24 miles NW. of Springfield.

North Chester, a post-village of Windsor co., Vt., on the Central Vermont R., 37 miles SSE. of Rutland. Pop. 60.

North Chesterville, a post-village of Franklin co., Me., about 30 miles NW. of Augusta. Pop. 100.

North Chicago, a banking post-village of Lake co., Ill., on the Chicago and Northwestern and the Elgin, Joliet and Eastern Rs., 3 miles from Waukegan. It has zinc-works, manufactures of gas-plants, machinery and castings, etc. Pop. about 1150.

North Chichester, a post-village of Merrimack co., N.H., 9 miles ENE. of Concord.

North Chili, a post-village of Monroe co., N.Y., 10 miles WSW. of Rochester, on the New York Central and Hudson River R. Pop. 175.

North Chillicothe, a post-town of Peoria co., Ill., in Chillicothe township. Pop. in 1900, 417.

North Clarendon, a post-village of Warren co., Pa. The banking point is Warren. It manufactures gas-engines, tanks and boilers, and has oil interests. Pop. about 1500.

North Clarendon, a post-village of Rutland co., Vt., on Otter Creek and on the Rutland R., 3 miles S. of Rutland. Pop. about 300.

North Clayton, a post-station of Crawford co., Wis.

Northclove, a post-village of Dutchess co., N.Y. Pop. about 90.

North Clymer, a post-village of Chautauqua co., N.Y., 35 miles S. by W. of Dunkirk.

North Coaticook, a post-village of Stanstead co., Quebec, 1 mile from Coaticook, its banking point.

North Codorus, a township of York co., Pa. Pop. in 1900, 2637.

North Cohasset, a village of Norfolk co., Mass., on the sea-shore near Nantasket Beach, 13 miles SE. of Boston.

North Cohocton, a post-village of Steuben co., N.Y., 13 miles E. of Dansville. Pop. about 350.

North Colebrook, a post-station of Litchfield co., Conn., about 35 miles WNW. of Hartford.

North Colesville, a post-village of Broome co., N.Y., 15 miles NE. of Binghamton. Pop. 100.

North Collins, a banking post-village of Erie co., N.Y., in North Collins township (town), on the Erie R., 23 miles S. of Buffalo. It has various mills and manufactures of crates and baskets. Pop. about 650; of the town in 1900, 2362.

North Columbia, a post-village of Nevada co., Cal., 10½ miles N. of Nevada City. Pop. about 200.

North Concord, a post-hamlet of Essex co., Vt., 12 miles E. of St. Johnsbury.

North Constantia, a post-village of Oswego co., N.Y., 7 miles from Constantia. Pop. 100.

North Conway, a banking post-village and summer-resort of Carroll co., N.H., on the E. bank of the Saco River and on the Boston and Maine and the Maine Central Rs., 60 miles WNW. of Portland, Me. It is surrounded by beautiful mountain-scenery and commands a fine prospect of the White Mountains. Pop. about 1000. Elevation, 520 feet.

North Cornville, a post-village of Somerset co., Me., 10 miles N. of Skowhegan. Pop. 100.

Northcote, a post-village of Kitson co., Minn., on the Great Northern R. The banking point is Hallock. Pop. 125.

Northcove, a post-station and township of McDowell co., N.C., in a valley at the base of the Blue Ridge, 15 miles N. of Marion. Pop. of the township in 1900, 1307.

Northcove, a post-station of Pacific co., Wash., on the N. side of Shoalwater Bay.

North Cove Creek, N.C., enters the Catawba from the N. in Burke co.

North Coventry, a village of Tolland co., Conn. The banking point is Rockville and the post-office Coventry.

North Coventry, a township of Chester co., Pa., is bounded on the N. by the Schuylkill River, which separates it from Pottstown. Pop. in 1900, 1664.

North Craftsbury, a post-village of Orleans co., Vt., about 30 miles NNE. of Montpelier. Pop. about 400.

North Crandon, a post-village of Forest co., Wis., 24½ miles E. of Rhinelander, on the Minneapolis, St. Paul and Sault Ste. Marie R. Pop. 150.

Northcreek, a post-hamlet of Phillips co., Ark., 3 miles from Marvell station.

Northcreek, a post-village of Warren co., N.Y., on the Hudson River, at the mouth of North Creek, and on the Delaware and Hudson R., 57 miles N. of Saratoga Springs. Pop. about 500. It has manufactures of harness.

North Cuba, a post-village of Allegany co., N.Y., on the Genesee Valley Canal, 3 miles N. of Cuba. Pop. 100.

North Cucamonga, a post-village of San Bernardino co., Cal., on the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Coast Lines. The banking point is Ontario or San Bernardino. Pop. 150.

North Cutler, a post-station of Washington co., Me.

North Dakota, a north-central state of the American Union, bounded N. by Manitoba and Assiniboia, E. by Minnesota, S. by South Dakota, and W. by Montana. Its northern limit is 49° N. lat.; its eastern boundary is the navigable Red River of the North, and the meridian of 104° W. lon. defines its western limit. Area of the land-surface, 70,195 sq. m.; of the appertaining waters, 600 sq. m.

Face of the Country.—The general elevation of the state is between 800–1000 feet (valley of the Red River of the North) in the E. and 2000–2800 ft. in the W. and SW. Sentinel Butte, on the line of the Northern Pacific R., is 2709 ft. Much of the land is flat plain or undulating prairie. The Missouri River enters the state from the W. and pursues its course to the SE. through a region of high plains and plateaus. With its tributaries it drains the western and southwestern sections of the state. Its principal affluents are the Yellowstone, which joins it shortly after both streams have crossed the western border of the state, the Little Missouri, Big Knife, Heart, and Cannon Ball rivers. The northern and eastern portions of the state belong to the Canadian system of drainage, the chief waters in this section being the Sheyenne and Pembina rivers, which discharge into the Red River of the North, and the Souris (or Mouse) River, which is a tributary of the Assiniboin. The region of eastern drainage is defined on the W. by the upper waters of the James (Pipestem) or Dakota River (which flows southward into South Dakota), and the Mouse River, already referred to. Westward of this section is the Plateau du Coteau du Missouri, a hilly and somewhat stony tract extending from the NW. corner of the state southeastward to South Dakota. Between the basins of the Mouse River and the Red River of the North is a limited area of interior drainage with no outflow to the sea. It contains a large salt lake, known as Devil's Lake, a picturesque sheet of water, about 40 miles long, which is now accessible by railroad. Its briny waters resemble those of the ocean both in appearance and in taste and afford opportunities for sea-bathing in the interior of the continent. E. of the Missouri River the surface is prairie, broken at first by the coteaus, then rolling, and finally becoming a flat level plain slightly inclined towards the E. and N. The valley of the Red River of the North is the bed of an extinct lake (Lake Agassiz), which existed in prehistoric times, extending eastward into Minnesota and northward into Manitoba. It now contains many lakes and streams and numerous dry coulées, or beds of streams where the water has ceased to flow. Within its limits are the most productive portions of the famous wheat-fields of this state. Along the beds of the rivers and surrounding the lakes are heavy belts of timber, largely cottonwood or poplar, but the greater part of the state is treeless, growing chiefly the grass and low herbage of the prairie.

Geology.—Nearly all the surface rocks belong to the Cretaceous period and are covered for the most part, except in the SW., by drift. There are extensive deposits of lignitic coal, of which there were mined, in 1901, 166,601 short tons, valued at $214,151, and in 1903, 278,645 tons, valued at $418,005. Salt springs and streams are numerous in portions of the Red River valley.

Climate.—The air is dry and invigorating. The climate is as a whole remarkably healthful and in summer and autumn is peculiarly delightful, although extremes of summer temperature (100°–110°) have been noted equal to those of the far south. The winters are severe, the mercury sometimes falling to 40° below zero, but, with the absence of the humidity which is characteristic of the atmosphere in the eastern part of the country, a greater degree of cold can be borne with comparatively little discomfort. Although there are at times great snow-storms or "blizzards," the fall of snow is, as a rule, very light when compared with that of the states in the east. Farming operations begin in April, and as the spring is seldom backward, they are not interrupted by the return of unfavorable weather. Long days of sunshine prevail in summer, and the high temperature which promotes the growth of vegetation is commonly relieved by refreshing prairie breezes during the night. The rainfall is never very heavy, but most of it comes during the spring and early summer months, so as to be generally sufficient to mature the crops. The average annual precipitation for the state barely exceeds 17 inches. In some sections irrigation is necessary.

Agriculture.—Wheat is the important agricultural product and will probably always be the chief staple. The Red River valley is unsurpassed on the continent as a wheat-growing region, and Dakota wheat is known the world over for its superiority. Wheat-growing in this state is conducted on the grandest scale. It is by no means uncommon to have single fields or farms of 20,000 acres or even more devoted to the cultivation of this cereal. Corn, oats, barley, flax, rye, and potatoes are valuable crops. The chief agricultural crops in 1900 were: wheat, 13,176,213 bushels; oats, 6,299,284 bushels; barley, 1,998,840 bushels; corn, 381,184 bushels; rye, 83,990 bushels; potatoes, 1,536,860 bushels; and hay, 247,327 tons. Stock-raising is an important industry in the western section. The amount of washed and unwashed wool obtained from the wool-clip of 1900 was 2,356,328 pounds. As yet the manufactures are mainly of the domestic type.

Railroads.—In 1878 there were in the whole territory of Dakota only 320 miles of railroad. In 1890 the state of North Dakota had 2116 miles, while the total mileage in 1900 was 2826. During certain seasons of the year the Missouri River and the Red River of the North afford important highways for commerce and travel.

Counties and Towns.—The state had in 1900 39 counties, —viz., Barnes, Benson, Billings, Bottineau, Burleigh, Cass, Cavalier, Dickey, Eddy, Emmons, Foster, Grand Forks, Griggs, Kidder, Lamoure, Logan, McHenry, McIntosh, McLean, Mercer, Morton, Nelson, Oliver, Pembina, Pierce, Ramsey, Ransom, Richland, Rolette, Sargent, Stark, Steele, Stutsman, Towner, Traill, Walsh, Ward, Wells, and Williams. Allred, Bowman, Dunn, Hettinger, Mackenzie, and Wallace cos. have been organized since the official census. The principal towns are Fargo (pop. in 1900, 9589); Bismarck, the capital (3319); and Grand Forks (7652).

Government.—The governor is elected for a term of 2 years. The legislature consists of a senate and a house of representatives, the members of the former elected for 4 years and those of the latter for 2 years. The state has 2 representatives in the national Congress.

Education.—Ample appropriations of land were made, in the act creating North Dakota as a state, for the future support of the common schools as well as for the maintenance of institutions of a higher grade. The leading educational institutions are the University of North Dakota at Grand Forks, Red River Valley University at Wahpeton, Fargo College, normal schools at Mayville and Valley City, and North Dakota Agricultural College and Experiment Station at Fargo.

Population.—The population in 1880 for the corresponding part of Dakota Territory was 36,909. The total population for the state in 1890 was 182,719, and in 1900, 319,146. The bulk of the inhabitants are foreign-born or of foreign parentage, the foreign-born alone in 1900 having numbered 113,091.

History.—North Dakota is a part of the region included in the Louisiana purchase of 1803. A fort was established at Pembina in 1810 by Lord Selkirk, who supposed this region to be British territory and to belong to his colony of Assiniboia. The territory of Dakota was organized in 1861, including at that time parts of what is now Montana and Wyoming. It was reduced in area in 1868. In 1889 the states of North and South Dakota were admitted into the Union.

North Sea, or German Ocean (Ger. Nordsee, nort′zā or Deutsches Meer, doitsh′ęs mair; anc. German′icum Ma′re or German′icus Oce′anus), an arm of the Atlantic Ocean, extending from the Strait of Dover to the Shetland Islands and bounded E. by Norway and Denmark, S. by Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium, and France, and W. by the British Isles. Length, 700 miles; extreme breadth, 420 miles. Area, approximately, 190,000 sq. m. On the NE. it forms a wide arm called the Skagerrak, 60 miles broad, which separates Norway from Denmark. This again communicates southward with the Cattegat, a great arm between Sweden and Denmark, and the Cattegat communicates with the Baltic by the 3 straits called the Sound (Öre Sund) and the Great and Little Belts. The shores of the countries that surround the North Sea are in general deeply indented with bays and arms (fjords), and bordered by steep cliffs or mountains; only in the SE. and S. (Denmark, Germany, the Netherlands, and Belgium) are there long reaches of flat land. The water is deepest on the Norwegian side, where, at the entrance to the Skagerrak (whence a current constantly passes westward), a sounding of 240 fathoms has been made, and where, within the limits of the Skagerrak, in lat. 58° 12′ N., lon. 9° 30′ E., a sounding has been made of 442 fathoms (2652 feet). In general the depth varies from 15–25 fathoms in the southerly parts to 30–75 fathoms in the N. The bed of this sea is traversed by several enormous banks, such as the Great and Little Fisher banks, the Jutland Bank, and the Dogger Bank, the last-named occupying the centre of the southern half of the sea-area. As parts of the North Sea may be mentioned Moray Firth, the firths of Tay and Forth; the Wash; the Humber and Thames estuaries; the estuaries of the Scheldt, Meuse, and Rhine; the Zuider Zee; and the estuaries of the Ems, Weser, and Elbe. The great oceanic tidal wave which originates in the Atlantic, having swept the W. coasts of Great Britain and Ireland, enters the N. extremity of the North Sea, giving high water nearly simultaneously to the opposite shores of Scotland and Norway. Pursuing its course along the coasts of the former and of England, on which it strikes very directly and with great force, it rules the tides as far S. as the Thames, and also determines the tides of a portion of the Belgian coast. On entering the North Sea on the N. of Scotland, the tidal wave does not exceed 12 feet, but it gradually increases, reaching on the Humber 20 feet. The salinity of the North Sea is somewhat greater than that of the free ocean. But little ice forms and there is little obstruction to navigation except in parts of the immediate shore-line. The fisheries (herring, etc.) in this sea are extensive, as well on the Dogger Bank, celebrated for its cod-fishery, as on all the shores that bound it; they are still greater at its N. extremity, towards the Orkney and Shetland Isles. A great ship canal, the Kaiser Wilhelm Canal, affords a short communication between the North Sea and the Baltic.

Northwest Provinces, the former name of a lieutenant-governership of British India, now styled the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh.

Northwest Territories, a term sometimes (and still officially) used to designate that portion of the main-land of Canada which is not included in Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba, and British Columbia, and which is constituted by a large area in the Labrador Peninsula, bounded on the W. by Hudson Bay, most of the immense tract extending W. from Hudson Bay to Alaska and British Columbia, and the islands, etc., in the Arctic Ocean W. of Greenland. Total area, about 2,600,000 sq. m. This vast tract of land, in the main corresponding to the old Hudson Bay Territory, came into the possession of the Dominion in 1869 and was governed through the lieutenancy of Manitoba until 1875, when it became a province, under a lieutenant-governor and council, appointed by the Dominion government. From 1888 to 1897 the province was administered by a lieutenant-governor, executive council, and assembly, with all the rights of a province except that of borrowing money. In 1897 the Northwest Territories came into full provincial rights. They are divided into eight districts: Keewatin, Assiniboia, Alberta, Athabasca, Saskatchewan, Ungava, Franklin, and Mackenzie. The province is administered by a lieutenant-governor, a legislative assembly, and an advisory executive council, consisting of the lieutenant-governor and 3 members elected by the people. The province sends 2 members to the Dominion senate and, since the redistribution of 1903, 10 members to the house of commons. Yukon district was erected into a judicial district in 1898 and was segregated from the Territories, thus depriving them of about 196,000 sq. m., including the rich gold dictricts on the Klondike and other rivers. Capital, Regina, in Assiniboia district. In a more restricted sense the name Northwest Territories includes only the provincial districts of Assiniboia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Athabasca, and Keewatin, the remaining regions of Ungava, Franklin (with the Arctic islands), and Mackenzie constituting the "unorganized territories." See CANADA and the names of the several districts and regions.

Northwest Territory, the designation of the vast region ceded by England to the United States in the treaty of Paris, in 1783, lying between the Ohio River and the Great Lakes and extending from the border of Pennsylvania to the Mississippi River. This territory had been surrendered by France to England at the close of the French and Indian War. Virginia, New York, Massachusetts, and Connecticut laid claim to most of it on the ground of their old charters, but they were soon compelled to relinquish their claims to sovereignty, large tracts of land, however, being assigned to them. In 1787 Congress passed the famous ordinance for the government of the Northwest Territory. Out of this region were subsequently constituted the states of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin, together with part of Minnesota.

Norway (Norw., Dan., and Sw. Norge, noR'gå; Ger. Norwegen, noR'wā'ghęn; Fr. Norvège, noR'vaizh'; L. Norwe'gia), a country forming the NW. portion of Europe and occupying the W. and NW. parts of the Scandinavian Peninsula. It extends from lat. 57° 57′ to 71° 11′ 40″ N. (North Cape, on the island of Magerö) and from lon. 4° 45′ to 31° 11′ E. It is bounded on the E. by Russian Lapland and Sweden and washed on all other sides by the sea, —by the Arctic Ocean on the N., the Atlantic Ocean and the North Sea on the NW. and W., and the Skagerrak on the S. Length, from SSW. to NNE., about 1050 miles; the breadth varies from about 20 miles in its narrowest part (in the N.) to 260 miles. Area, 124,100 sq. m.

The coast-line consists, for the most part, of bold precipitous cliffs, and is remarkable both for the innumerable islands by which it is lined and the bays or fjords which deeply indent it, sometimes forming excellent harbors. Among the more noted of these fjords are the Varanger (in the NE.), Lyngen, Folden, Trondhjem, Sogne (4000 feet deep), Hardanger, Bukke, and Christiania (SE.), nearly all of which are characterized by abrupt contours and a landscape of striking beauty and Alpine majesty. The principal islands are those of the Lofoten group (separated from the main-land by the Vestfjord) and, farther N., Magerö, Sorö, Ringvalsö, Hvalö, and Senjen. Between these and the main-land there is a wide passage for coasting-vessels.

Relief of the Land.—The surface of Norway is very mountainous, particularly in the W. and N.; but the mountain-chains, so called, although in general they have a NE.–SW. trend corresponding to the axis of the peninsula, are more in the nature of elevated plateaus, from which mountain-masses rise with the greatest irregularity. The best known or more distinctive parts of these plateaus are: 1. The plateau of Finmark. 2. The plateau of Nordland and Trondhjem, extending to the Trondhjem-Fjord and Lake Storsjön. 3. The Dovrefjeld plateau, with its lofty peaks of Sneehätten (7630 feet, at one time thought to be the loftiest summit of Norway), Skrimkolla, Stenkolla, and Nunsfjeld. 4. The Langfjeld plateau, which virtually comprises the remaining southern part of the country, and contains the Galdhöppigen, the culminating point of the Scandinavian Peninsula and of the broad Ymesfjeld plateau (8400 ft.); the Hornelen, a sharp, jagged peak, 2940 ft. high, and nearly overhanging the sea, at the E. extremity of the island of Bremanger; the Fillefjeld, near the head of the Sognefjord; and the Hardanger-Fjeld. In the region eastward of the Hardanger-Fjord is the huge snow and ice plateau, known as the Folgefond, about 23 miles in length and from 3 to 9 miles in width, with a nearly even summit upward of 4000 ft. in height, from which numerous ice-tongues descend into the radiating valleys. 5. The East plateau, the lowest of all, and extending into Sweden, where its direction may be traced by the chain of lakes which stretches across that country. The mountains in the N., bordering on Russia, rarely exceed 1000 ft. in height. In general the face of the country is markedly rugged; the valleys are short and abrupt, and the streams form numerous cascades; while the fjords, overhung by lofty precipices or towering forests, and the deep and extensive lakes embosomed among the mountains, furnish scenes of the wildest magnificence. Vast glaciers (reaching to within about 2000 ft. of sea-level) descend from the plateaus (Buarbrä, fed by the snow-fields of the Folgefond; Jostedalsbrä, in the Sognefjord, the largest glacier of Europe, whose ice-field or forming basin covers upward of 300 sq. m.). The only plains are those formed by the table-lands, and the isolated mountain-peaks on these table-lands rise far above the snow-line.

Rivers.—Norway has no large rivers, but an immense number of minor streams, from the western slope, proceed directly to the shore or the numerous fjords which penetrate it. On the E. slope, again, the streams do little more than commence their course in Norway. The rivers that are of importance have a S. direction and discharge themselves into the Skagerrak. Among them are the Glommen, with its affluent the Laagen (or Lougen), the Drammen, Lauven, Skien-Nid, and Torrisdal, but none of them are navigable, except at their mouths, on account of water-falls. Among the more remarkable of these are the Sarpenfos, on the Glommen; the Rukaufos, in the district of Telemarken, which falls 513 feet perpendicular; the Vöringsfos, in the district of Hardanger, with a perpendicular fall of 520 ft.; and the Skykjefos, with a fall of nearly 700 ft. in a nearly consecutive descent of 2000 ft. The most important rivers in the N. are the Tana, which forms part of the boundary between Russia and Norway and falls into the Arctic Ocean, and the Namsen, flowing into the Atlantic. The lakes are numerous, the largest being Mjösen. Many of them are situated at great elevations on the table-land. Among these the Bygdinsee, from 15 to 20 miles long, is 3490 ft. above the sea.

Climate.—Although a large part of Norway is situated within the frozen zone, various causes contribute to modify the temperature. One of these is the great extent of sea-coast and the large extent of surface occupied by water, and more especially by the fjords which are in immediate communication with the ocean, and the temperature of which is sensibly affected by the Gulf Stream drift. The snow-line is much higher here than in corresponding latitudes in other countries. The sea (except near the heads of the fjords) never freezes, even at North Cape, but the shallower waters of the Skagerrak are sometimes frozen. The climate is severe only upon the uplands and in the interior bordering upon Sweden. Near Stavanger the mean January temperature is 34.5° and the July temperature 55.5°. The January temperature of Christiania is 23°. At the North Cape the mean yearly temperature is 35.5°.

The year is nearly divided between winter and summer. Snow covers the ground from the beginning of November till the end of March. Summer lasts from May to September. The climate of the W. coast in its more southerly parts, though comparatively mild, is excessively humid, the rainfall amounting to 70–75 inches annually, with a maximum (at Florö) of 90–92 inches. In Nordland the precipitation is in many parts reduced to 40 inches.

Plants and Animals.—Among trees the pines are the most numerous and clothe the mountain-slopes with magnificent forests. The oak forms fine forests in the S.; the birch attains the highest northern latitudes. The beech and elm are also properly forest trees, the former extending its range to the 62d parallel of latitude. Of fruit-trees the apple is common in the lower regions and the cherry and plum are widely distributed, yielding even within a short distance of the Arctic Circle.

By far the greater part of the area of Norway is altogether unproductive. About one-fifth is covered with forest. But a very small fraction is under cultivation. Barley is grown as high as 70° N. lat. Rye is cultivated up to lat. 69°, oats to 68° and 70°, but wheat not beyond 64° and that only in the most favorable seasons. The period of ripening of some of these grains is about the same as in lower latitudes. Potatoes are grown with success even in Finmark. Cattle-rearing is an extensive branch of rural economy, the inhabitants leaving the villages and spending the summer with their flocks and herds in the upper valleys. Most kinds of live-stock are well represented. The reindeer forms the main stock of the northern region. The principal animals of prey are the glutton, bear, wolf, lynx, and fox. Game is abundant, including the deer, elk, reindeer, hare, seal, and otter, and, among birds, the grouse and the capercailzie. A remarkable member of the Norwegian mammalian fauna is the migrating lemming. The coasts swarm with sea-fowl; the wild goose and ducks of various kinds, including the eider-duck, are numerous; the swan appears on the S. coast in winter. In the small uninhabited isles off the N. coast vast numbers of the eggs of sea-fowl are procured.

Fisheries.—The fisheries of Norway are of very great value. Whales are captured for use in the manufacture of fertilizers, as well as for their oil, but a far more valuable source of revenue is furnished by the cod- and herring-fisheries. The Lofoten cod-fisheries alone give employment to upward of 30,000 fishermen, and the catch has been known to reach in a year upward of 35,000,000 fish. The number of persons engaged throughout the country in the cod-fishery in 1900 was 82,098; in the summer herring-fishery, 20,705; and in the mackerel-fishery, 2741. The rivers and lakes abound in salmon and trout. There are extensive beds of oysters on all the coasts.

Minerals.—The minerals are both numerous and abundant and, where the means of transport exist, can generally be worked to advantage, but the total mining- and metal-industry is still unimportant. The mines in operation are those of silver, copper, iron, cobalt, chrome, and feldspar. The chief product is iron, the mines of which are situated mostly near the Gulf of Christiania; the silver-mine of Kongsberg was at one time one of the richest in Europe and, next to the copper-mine of Röraas, the most important in the country. Coal has been found at a number of points on the main-land and also on some of the outlying islands. The other minerals worthy of notice are alum and marble.

Manufactures, Commerce.—The industries of Norway comprise ship-building and the manufacture of foundry-products, lumber and wooden-ware, textiles of silk, cotton, wool, and flax, paper, malted liquors, tobacco, leather, cordage, glass, pottery, etc. All the seats of industry are on the coast and chiefly on the Gulf of Christiania.

The exportation of fish is the most important branch of trade. Next to this is the export of timber, wooden manufactures, timber products, paper and paper manufactures, hides, ice, and the products of the mines and metal forges. Fish is exported from all the towns on the W. coast, but Bergen is the chief entrepôt. The most important items of this trade are dried fish and salted herrings.

Communication.—The rivers are not navigable except near their mouths, few good roads of any great length exist away from the sea border, and the usual communication is by sea. Regular communication has been established between the principal towns on the coast from Christiania to Hammerfest. The number of miles of railway operated in 1901 was 1308.

Government and Population.—Norway was down to 1905 a limited hereditary monarchy. For nearly a century the kingdom had been united with Sweden under one sovereign, having, however, its own ministry (composed of Norwegians) and its own legislature. The management of common affairs was vested in a council of state, composed of Swedes and Norwegians. In 1905 the nation severed its connection with Sweden. The legislative assembly, or, as it is called, Storthing (from stor, great, and thing, court), is elected by the citizens and exists for three years, when a new election takes place. It is subdivided into two chambers,—one consisting of one-fourth of the members and called the Lagthing; and the other, of three-fourths, and called the Odelsthing. These chambers meet separately and each nominates its own president and secretary. Every bill must originate in the Odelsthing. The members of the Storthing are chosen by indirect election, the voters voting for electors, who elect the deputies. Universal suffrage exists. A voter must have completed his twenty-fifth year. There are no titles of nobility in Norway. The capital is Christiania.

The population of Norway according to the census of 1900 was 2,239,880. The increase in the decade preceding was 12 per cent. The country is divided into 20 districts or amts (amter), as follows:

Amter.	Pop. in 1900.	Amter.	Pop. in 1900.
Christiania (town)..	227,626	Söndre Bergenhus..	135,752

Nedenes.....	79,935	Finmark.....	32,800
Lister og Mandal....	81,567
Stavanger	127,592	Total	2,239,880

About 2½ per cent. of the inhabitants are Swedes. There are about 20,000 Laps and 8000 Finns. The foreign-born population is insignificant. The five largest cities are Christiania (the capital), Bergen, Trondhjem, Stavanger, and Drammen. The Lutheran religion is the national church, supported by the state. At the head of the educational institutions is the University of Christiania. School education is compulsory. The Norwegians are a branch of the Scandinavian race. Danish (with a pronunciation somewhat different from what is heard in Denmark) is the speech of the educated classes and the language of modern Norwegian literature. Various Norwegian dialects very close to the Danish are spoken by the peasantry.

History.—The history of Norway prior to the ninth century is enveloped in fable. Towards the close of that century the country, hitherto divided among several rulers, was united into a kingdom by Harald Haarfagr. Before this time the Northmen (Norwegians, Danes) had become the terror of western Europe. Their inroads into Britian began about 789 and a little later the Frankish dominions were invaded. Ireland, as well as Britain, was invaded by them. They pillaged Paris repeatedly in the ninth century and about 911 obtained the cession of a part of France, afterwards called Normandy. In 874 they settled in Iceland and a century later the Icelanders began to colonize Greenland. The main-land of America is supposed to have been discovered by Northmen about 1000. From the side of Sweden, too, the Scandinavians advanced on a career of conquest. The Varangians, supposed to have been Northmen, laid the foundations of the Russian empire at Novgorod about 862, and a few years later we find them before the walls of Constantinople. The Christianization of Norway was effected in the course of the tenth and eleventh centuries. In Ireland the Scandinavians suffered a great overthrow at Clontarf in 1014. For a time the Norwegians were in possession of the Orkney and Shetland islands and the Hebrides. Their last invasion of Scotland was repelled in 1263. In 1397 Margaret, queen of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, daughter of Valdemar IV. of Denmark, effected the union of Kalmar, by which the crowns of the three Scandinavian kingdoms were to remain permanently united under one sovereign. In 1523 Sweden again became a separate kingdom, but the union between Denmark and Norway was drawn closer and closer, to the disadvantage of the latter, which was reduced to the position of a mere dependency of the former. Denmark was forced to cede Norway to Sweden in Jan., 1814 (treaty of Kiel). The Norwegians resisted this transfer, but their resistance was unavailing in the face of the Swedish arms. Norway did not, however, become part of the kingdom of Sweden. The two crowns were declared indissolubly united, but each kingdom retained its separate constitution. This union was declared dissolved by Norway in 1905.

Norwich, nor'rij or nor'ritch, a city and parliamentary and county borough of England, within the territorial limits of the county of Norfolk, on the Wensum, just above its confluence with the Yare, 98 miles NNE. of London. It retains many quaint mediæval dwellings and has numerous venerable edifices. Some of the gates of the ancient fortifications have survived. The most interesting structures are the old Norman castle, situated on high ground near the centre of the city, its keep now used as a museum; the beautiful Norman cathedral, founded at the close of the eleventh century, with one of the highest spires in England (315 feet); the church of St. Peter's, Mancroft; the guild-hall, dating from the early part of the fifteenth century; and St. Andrew's Hall. There is a grammar-school dating from the reign of Edward VI. Norwich early became the seat of the textile industry through the influx of the Flemings, and this branch of manufacture is still important. The town has manufactures of mustard, starch, agricultural implements, shoes, and foundry products, and dyeing, distilling, and brewing are carried on. There are large nursery gardens in the outskirts. Norwich returns 2 members to parliament. It has been the seat of a bishopric since the beginning of the eleventh century. Pop. in 1851, 68,000; in 1891, 101,300; in 1901, 111,733.

Norwich, nor'ritch or nor'witch, a city, semi-capital of New London co., Conn., finely situated on the Thames River, here formed by the confluence of the Shetucket and the Yantic, 13 miles N. of New London, on the New York, New Haven and Hartford and the Central Vermont Rs. It is noted for its beautiful residences, which occupy several terraces in the most elevated parts of the city. Norwich is at the head of navigation and has a commodious harbor. It contains a court-house, public library, theatre, masonic temple, the Norwich Free Academy, with the Slater Art Museum, the St. Patrick's Roman Catholic Church, etc. The branches of the Thames afford water-power here for various kinds of manufactories, which are very numerous and extensive. The products of these are cotton goods, woollens, velvets and silks, paper and leather, belting, locks, machinery, cutlery, fire-arms, iron pipes, etc. There is also considerable ship-building. Pop. of the city in 1900, 17,251; of the township (town), which includes Norwich city, 24,637.

Nova Scotia, no'vȧ sko'shȧ, a province of the Dominion of Canada, lying between 43° 25′ and 47° N. lat. and between 59° 40′ and 66° 25′ W. lon. It consists of a long, narrow peninsula, called Nova Scotia proper, and the island of Cape Breton, which is separated from the main-land by the Gut of Canso. It is bounded N. by Northumberland Strait (which separates it from Prince Edward Island) and by the Gulf of St. Lawrence; NE., SE., and S. by the Atlantic Ocean; and SW. and W. by the Bay of Fundy and New Brunswick, with which latter it is connected by an isthmus only 11 miles wide, separating the Bay of Fundy from Northumberland Strait. Area of the land-surface, 20,550 sq. m.

The Cobequid Range (or Hills) of mountains, with subordinate lines of heights, runs through the north interior of the province, which nowhere rises above 1200 feet, and on each side of this range are rich, arable lands, where agricultural operations are carried on extensively. From Briar Island, at the extremity of Digby Neck, to Cape Split, a distance of 130 miles along the Bay of Fundy, extends a ridge of mural precipices (the North Mountains), in many places from 100 to 600 feet in height, beyond which lies the rich and beautiful valley of the Annapolis.

Nova Scotia is abundantly supplied with capacious harbors, the greater number, including Halifax, being on the SE. coast, between capes Sable and Canso. There are also excellent harbors on Cape Breton Island and on the N. side of the province. The largest lake in Nova Scotia proper is Lake Rossignol, 20 miles in length; and among others are Ship Harbor Lake; Grand Lake, discharging its waters northward through the Shubenacadie River into Cobequid Bay; and College Lake, in the eastern part of the peninsula. The lakes of Cape Breton are much larger and more important. The great Bras d'Or Lake, more properly an inland sea, is a magnificent expanse of water, abounding in fish. Of the rivers of Nova Scotia the most important are the Shubenacadie, the Avon, and the Annapolis, flowing into the Bay of Fundy; the St. Mary, Musquodoboit, Lahave, and Liverpool, flowing into the Atlantic. The most remarkable body of water in the province is Minas Basin, the E. arm of the Bay of Fundy, penetrating 60 miles inland and terminating in Cobequid Bay. The tides here rush in with great impetuosity and form what is called the bore. At the equinoxes they have been known to rise from 60 to 70 feet, while in Halifax harbor, on the opposite coast, the spring tides rise only from 6 to 9 feet. The other principal bays are St. George Bay and Chedabucto Bay, in the E., connected by the Gut of Canso; St. Mary Bay and Townsend Bay, in the extreme W. of the peninsula; and Mahone and St. Margaret bays, on the S. coast.

The province of Nova Scotia is rich in geological formations, almost the entire series from the crystalline granites to the Triassic sandstone being here met with. In the isthmus connecting the peninsula with New Brunswick, the underlying rocks consist of variously colored sandstones of the coal-measures, containing seams of good bituminous coal, many of which are profitably worked. Coal is extensively mined at three chief localities—Cumberland, Pictou, and in Cape Breton. At the famous Joggins field, on Chignecto Channel, the Carboniferous series is exposed in a thickness of nearly 15,000 feet and shows 20 or more beds of coal in vertical succession. The yield of coal in 1900 was 3,626,628 tons, valued at $5,947,670. Gold has also been extensively mined and its product in 1900 was valued at $607,152. The total production of gold from the Nova Scotia mines from 1862 to 1895 was 602,268 ounces, valued at $11,808,486. Copper, lead, silver, and manganese are fairly abundant. Iron is an important product; the quantity of ore seems inexhaustible and the quality manufactured is equal to the best. Gypsum is extensively worked near Windsor and in Cape Breton and occurs in masses of great thickness. Beautiful agates, amethysts, chalcedonies, jaspers, cairngorms, and the entire group of zeolite minerals abound in the amygdaloidal trap along the Bay of Fundy.

The climate of Nova Scotia is remarkably temperate, considering its northern latitude. The extreme of cold is 20° below zero; the extreme of heat, which is rarely attained, is 95°–98°. The summer maximum at Halifax is about 87°. Dense fogs are at certain seasons prevalent along the Atlantic coast. The annual precipitation is about 45 inches. Wheat, rye, oats, barley, buckwheat, Indian corn, potatoes, turnips, mangel-wurzel, tomatoes, etc., grow in abundance. Apples, pears, plums, cherries, and other garden fruits attain the utmost perfection. In some sections of the country peaches and grapes ripen in the open air. The apple-orchards of Annapolis and Kings cos. are very productive.

The manufactures include coarse cloths, called "homespuns," flannels, bed-linen, blankets, carpets, and tweeds. Tanning is carried on to some extent; and in the towns and villages boots, shoes, saddlery, harness, household furniture, agricultural implements, printing- and wrapping-paper, carriages, and other articles are manufactured. The iron- and steel-industries have been developed to some extent and there is considerable sugar-refining. There is an extensive ship-building industry.

The fisheries of Nova Scotia are among the finest in the world. There is no part of its coast where a profitable fishery may not be pursued. Its bays and harbors and inland lakes and rivers teem with salmon, cod, halibut, haddock, mackerel, herring, shad, lobsters, etc. The total value of the fish-catch in 1898 was $7,226,035, of which the lobsters amounted to $2,673,625, the cod to $1,896,614, the haddock to $532,648, and the mackerel to $523,594. In 1901 the product was valued at $7,989,548.

There were, in 1900, 927 miles of railroad in operation, the lines traversing the full length of the peninsula and crossing Cape Breton.

The public affairs of the province are administered by a lieutenant-governor, an executive council, a legislative council of 21 members, and a legislative assembly of 38 members.

Nova Scotia (exclusive of Cape Breton, which see) is divided into 14 counties, as follows: Annapolis, Antigonish, Colchester, Cumberland, Digby, Guysborough, Halifax, Hants, Kings, Lunenburg, Pictou, Queens, Shelburne, and Yarmouth. Total pop. of the province in 1901, 459,574.

Halifax is the capital and chief city, with a population of 40,832. Other towns are Sydney (Cape Breton), 9909; Yarmouth, Pictou, New Glasgow, and Lunenburg. Small towns and villages are scattered over the province, which are accessible from the most remote districts by railway or steamboat or by good carriage-roads.

John Cabot, sailing in the service of Henry VII. of England, reached the shores of North America in the vicinity of Nova Scotia in 1497. The first attempt at settlement was made in 1604 by the French, who called the region Acadia, which name covered a large territory outside of Nova Scotia (New Brunswick, etc.). The English claimed this part of America by right of the discovery of Cabot, and in 1621 Sir William Alexander obtained from James I. a grant of Acadia, which the English renamed Nova Scotia. His attempt at colonization proved a failure. The dispute between England and France regarding the possession of Nova Scotia was settled in 1713, when the region was formally relinquished by France. Thousands of the French Acadians were deported by the English in 1755. In 1763 the island of Cape Breton was annexed to Nova Scotia. In 1784 the province of New Brunswick was formed out of a part of its territory. In 1867 Nova Scotia became a member of the Dominion of Canada.

Novgorod, styled Novgorod Veliki (vȧ-lee'kee) ("Great Novgorod"), a city of Russia, capital of a government of the same name, on the Volkhov, near the point where it issues from Lake Ilmen, 103 miles SSE. of St. Petersburg. It is divided by the river into two parts, that on the left bank containing the citadel-like Kremlin and the cathedral of St. Sophia and known as the Sophia side, and that on the right bank being the commercial town. Novgorod is but a shadow of what it was in former times. Its interesting features are mostly relics of the past. It is a city of venerable churches, which with their many round cupolas present a striking picture. The cathedral of St. Sophia, restored at the close of the last century, is a notable edifice. On the Kremlin square stands a splendid monument, erected in 1862 to commemorate the 1000th anniversary of the foundation of the Russian Empire, of which Novgorod was the cradle. In the commercial quarter are a number of quaint and interesting structures. Novgorod is the seat of an archbishop. In the latter part of the Middle Ages Novgorod was the capital of a large and flourishing state with republican institutions. It was a member of the Hanseatic League and the leading commercial town in the far north of Europe. In population it ranked among the foremost cities of Christendom. In 1478 it succumbed to the power of Moscow, and the bloody work of Ivan the Terrible in 1570 completed its downfall. Pop. in 1897, 26,095.

Nubia, nu'be-a, a region of eastern Africa, forming part of the Egyptian Sudan, extending southward from Egypt (about lat. 22° N.) to Omdurman (or to the Egyptian Sudan proper) and from the Red Sea on the E. to the Desert of Sahara on the W. It is traversed throughout its entire extent by the Nile and is in greater part of a desert character. The fertile area is situated almost entirely in the valley of the Nile, which is here so narrow as to leave little space for cultivation on its banks, and the productive districts are found in the gorges between the mountains and on the islands. A desert of sand and rocks, with some small fertile oases, extends E. from Lower Nubia to the Red Sea. In Upper Nubia the country is more varied. The Nile here receives its last affluent, the Atbara, 209 miles below the junction of the White Nile and Blue Nile; between these rivers are situated the fertile regions of Shendi and Halfai. The climate of Nubia is extremely hot and dry, but on the whole healthy. Agriculture employs most of the population on the banks of the Nile and its tributaries and artificial irrigation is resorted to as in Egypt. Chief products are durrah, barley, cotton, indigo, tobacco, senna, coffee, and dates. Cattle, sheep, and goats are reared by the Arabs of the neighboring deserts. Manufactures are limited to articles for domestic use. An extensive transit trade is carried on with the interior of Africa and Egypt and the region is traversed by important caravan routes. Suakin, on the Red Sea, is the chief port. The inhabitants of Nubia consist of Hamitic peoples (the best known of which are the Bisharin or Beja) and Arabs. In Egypt the Hamitic Nubians are known as Beraber (Berbers). Remains of ancient edifices occur in many parts of the valley of the Nile. Previous to the conquest of Nubia by Mehemet Ali of Egypt, in 1821, it was governed by a multitude of independent chiefs; between 1821 and 1882, which marked the beginning of the Mahdi uprising, it was directly under the dominion of Egypt. Egyptian sovereignty was reestablished in 1898. Chief towns are Khartum, Omdurman, Wadi-Halfa, Dongola, Berber, and Suakin. Most of the principal towns are situated on the Cairo railway.

Nuremberg, nu'rẹm-bẹrg (Ger. Nürnberg, nürn'bĕrg; L. Norimberga), the second city in population of Bavaria, in Middle Franconia, on the river Pegnitz, 95 miles N. of Munich. Lat. of observatory, 49° 27′ N.; lon. 11° 4′ 30″ E. It has retained in a unique degree its mediæval aspect,—its turreted walls, narrow streets, red-roofed gable houses, and beautiful fountains and statues, memorials of the time when Dürer, Krafft, and Vischer made their birthplace the centre of German art,—rendering it the quaintest city in Germany if not in the whole of Europe. The narrow Pegnitz, traversing Nuremberg from E. to W. and dividing it into two nearly equal parts, constitutes, with its numerous fine bridges, a strikingly picturesque feature of the city. The N. and S. sections of the town, the Sebalderseite and the Lorenzerseite, taking their names from their principal churches, are still in part surrounded by the mediæval walls and a dry moat. Beyond the ancient fortifications lie the suburbs to which the industrial establishments are largely confined. The dominant feature of the architectural landscape is the mediæval imperial castle, the Kaiserburg. A castle stood here as early as the first half of the eleventh century. In the second half of the twelfth century the emperor Frederick Bàrbarossa rebuilt the structure. A relic of the original Burg survives in the tower known as Alt-Nürnberg. The Kaiserburg crowns a precipitous rock in the extreme N. of the Sebalderseite. It is now a royal residence and houses a rich collection of objects of art. The foremost ecclesiastical edifices of the city are the Lorenzkirche, built in the thirteenth century and restored in the nineteenth, with superb stained-glass windows and a splendidly sculptured ciborium; the beautiful Gothic Sebalduskirche, dating from the close of the Middle Ages, with the tomb of the saint by Peter Vischer and a monument by Krafft; the Marienkirche (Frauenkirche), with a fine portal; and the churches of St. John and St. Ægidius. The most interesting secular edifices are, in addition to the Kaiserburg, the town-hall, in Italian Renaissance style with many frescoes and paintings; the Chamber of Commerce; many quaint old dwellings, notably the houses of Dürer and Hans Sachs (the cobbler-poet of Nuremberg); and Krafft's "Stations of the Cross."

Nuremberg is rich in works of sculptural art, chief among them being the Schöne Brunnen, a Gothic pyramid of the fourteenth century; the statue of Dürer, designed by Rauch; and the Tugendbrunnen ("fountain of virtue"). The city is the seat of the National Germanic Museum, founded in 1852 and occupying a former Carthusian monastery. It contains splendid collections of Christian and early mediæval antiquities, paintings, engravings, statuary, etc., and a library of over 200,000 volumes. Among other notable institutions are the Bavarian Industrial Museum, the natural history museum, the Railway Museum, the old gymnasium, founded by Melanchthon, and the municipal library, containing about 100,000 volumes. The collection of national archives is of great historical interest. St. John's Cemetery contains many interesting tombs, among them that of Dürer.

Nuremberg has long been noted for its small wares, known in trade as "Nuremberg wares," such as toys and small gold, silver, and ivory articles, etc., which are sent all over the world. The town holds a high place in the lithographic industry. There are extensive machine-shops and manufactures of lead-pencils, watches, hardware, optical goods, foundry products, paints, gold-leaf, railway-cars, automobiles, electric supplies, etc. The city is an important trade-centre. It is the largest hop-market in the world. The first steam-railway in Germany (that connecting Nuremberg with the neighboring town of Fürth) was opened in 1835. Watches were invented in Nuremberg about the close of the fifteenth century and terrestrial and celestial globes were first manufactured here. Pop. in 1880, 99,519; in 1890, 142,590; in 1900, 261,081 (mostly Protestants).

In the latter part of the Middle Ages Nuremberg rose to the position of one of the most flourishing and powerful city commonwealths of the German Empire. The fifteenth and sixteenth centuries were its golden age in art, learning, and poetry. In 1525 it embraced the Reformation and in 1532 the first religious peace, in which Charles V. was forced to grant terms to the German Protestants, was signed here. In 1806 Nuremberg was deprived of its position as a free city and annexed to Bavaria.

Oder, o′dẹr (anc. Via′drus), one of the chief rivers of Germany, rises in the Odergebirge, near Olmütz, in Moravia, flows N., and afterwards NW., through Prussian Silesia, Brandenburg, and Pomerania, traverses the Stettiner-Haff, and enters the Baltic by 3 branches, the Dievenow on the E., the Swine (the navigable arm), in the middle, and the Peene on the W. Length, about 550 miles. It is of great commercial importance and is now navigable over most of its course. The river is connected by canals with other streams of Germany. Principal tributaries are the Warthe, with the Netze, the Bober, Glatzer Neisse, and Ihna. The principal cities on the Oder, proceeding downward, are Oppeln, Breslau, Frankfort-on-the-Oder, and Stettin (the last near its mouth).

Odes′sa, the most important city and seaport of southern Russia and the fourth city of the empire in population, in the government of Kherson and a short distance E. of the mouth of the Dnieper, 90 miles WSW. of Kherson and about 400 miles NNE. of Constantinople. Lat. of observatory, 46° 28′ 36″ N.; lon. 30° 45′ 32″ E. It is situated on an eminence which slopes down to an inlet of the Black Sea. Of recent growth and well laid out with broad handsome streets and modern edifices, it wears a West-European rather than a Russian aspect. The chief attraction of the city is the Nikolayevsky Boulevard, a magnificent avenue, lined with rows of overarching trees and commanding superb views of the bay, to which a fine flight of steps descends. The principal buildings are the cathedral, exchange, theatre, archiepiscopal residence, city-hall, governor's palace, municipal library, containing about 150,000 volumes, and university. The Imperial New Russian University, founded in 1865, had in 1903–04 about 1900 students. It possesses a library of 50,000 volumes and a fine museum. Odessa is the seat of the Imperial Society of History and Antiquities and has an interesting museum of antiquities. The finest monuments of the city are those to Alexander II., Catharine II., and the Duc de Richelieu (the able administrator of the district in the reign of Alexander I.), the last-named on the Nikolayevsky Boulevard. The water supply of Odessa is drawn from a point in the Dniester by means of an aqueduct 25 miles long. The harbor, which is extensive and thoroughly equipped, is divided by moles into several ports. Odessa is the largest shipping point of Russia, immense quantities of grain produced in southern Russia passing through it. Its situation near the great waterways of the Dnieper and the Dniester makes it the natural outlet for the exports of the SW. provinces of the empire. It is an important industrial city and has mills, iron-works, and manufactures of matches, sugar, leather, textiles, soap, chemicals, starch, etc. Odessa was founded by Catharine II. in 1792, soon after the extension of Russian dominion to the shores of the Black Sea. The town is the seat of an archbishop. Pop. in 1802, 9000; in 1852, 97,000; in 1892, 345,000; in 1901, 450,218. Nearly one-third of the inhabitants are Jews and there are several thousand Germans.

Ohio, o-hī′o, one of the chief affluents of the Mississippi, is formed by the Alleghany and Monongahela rivers, which unite at Pittsburg, in Pennsylvania, forming a navigable stream about 600 yards wide. This point is about 730 feet above sea-level. The Ohio flows first northwestward to Beaver, and then generally southwestward to the mouth of the Big Sandy River, on the borders of West Virginia and Kentucky, forming throughout the greater portion of this course the boundary-line between West Virginia and Ohio. It next forms the boundary between Kentucky and Ohio and pursues a west-northwestward course to Cincinnati. After reaching the E. border of Indiana it runs nearly southwestward with a very sinuous course, and forms the boundary between Indiana and Illinois on the right and Kentucky on the left, until it enters the Mississippi at Cairo, at an elevation of about 300 feet above sea-level, in lat. 37° N. The Ohio is nearly 1000 miles long, and the area drained by it is computed to be 210,000 sq. m. This river is remarkable for the gentleness and uniformity of its current. Large steamboats can navigate it from Pittsburg to its mouth, except in the low stages of water—i.e., in summer—and when it is closed by ice in winter. The Ohio receives on the right the Muskingum, Scioto, Miami, and Wabash rivers, and on the left the Great Kanawha, Big Sandy, Licking, Kentucky, Green, Cumberland, and Tennessee rivers. The last two are the largest affluents. The chief towns on its banks (in descending order) are Pittsburg, Wheeling, Marietta, Portsmouth, Newport, Cincinnati, Covington (directly opposite Cincinnati), Madison, Louisville, New Albany, Evansville, and Paducah. In the upper part of its course the river flows among verdant hills and beautiful scenery. Near Louisville the navigation was formerly obstructed by rocky rapids, where the river descends 24 feet in a distance of 2 miles. To obviate this difficulty a canal wide and deep enough for steamboats has been opened. The water of this river is subject to great variations of level and the difference between high- and low-water is 50 ft. or more. The width of the river varies from 500 yards or less to 1400 yards. It encloses a large number of islands. Between Pittsburg and Portsmouth it flows for about 350 miles through the great coal-fields of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia.

Ohio, a north-central state of the American Union, bounded N. by the state of Michigan and Lake Erie, E. by Pennsylvania and West Virginia, S. by West Virginia and Kentucky, and W. by Indiana. The boundary on the side of Michigan is the parallel of 41° 42″ N. lat. A number of small islands in the SW. part of Lake Erie belong to Ohio. Along Lake Erie the state has a water-front of 230 miles, while the navigable Ohio River, which separates it from West Virginia and Kentucky, washes the SE. and S. borders of the state for 436 miles. Area of the land-surface, 40,760 sq. m.; of the appertaining waters, 300 sq. m.

The face of the country may be described as a low-lying table-land whose water-shed has an average altitude of about 1160 feet. The highest point (Bellefontaine, 1540 ft.) is in Logan co. in the west-central part of the state. The northern slope reaches Lake Erie (elevation, 573 ft.) by easy grades of descent, the surface being generally level or gently rolling, while the southern and southeastern aspects have a somewhat greater pitch, the Ohio at the SW. angle of the state being only 433 ft. and at its highest point on the eastern border about 665 ft. above the sea. The Ohio thus falls some 230 ft. in 436 miles; and this river and many of its tributaries have cut for themselves deep trough-like valleys. The banks of the Ohio have, therefore, a remarkably bold aspect, and portions of its immediate valleys are occupied by steep bluffs. A part of the southeastern or coal region is cut deeply into a labyrinth of narrow ravines. In the NW. is a fairly well-timbered area, naturally swampy, but a large part of the state falls within the area formerly designated prairie. A striking physiographic feature of the state is the divide, or line of elevation, taking a NE.–SW. course, which defines the drainage areas or slopes of the N. and the S.

Rivers, etc.—The Little Beaver, Mahoning, Muskingum, Hocking, Scioto, and Little and Great Miami are tributaries of the Ohio, and the Maumee, Portage, Sandusky, Huron, Vermilion, Black, Rocky, Cuyahoga, Chagrin, Grand, and Ashtabula rivers flow into Lake Erie. The latter have in several instances been so improved that their mouths afford harbor facilities. The state has several hundreds of miles of canal navigation and the streams afford much water-power.

Mineral Resources.—The keystone of the geological system of Ohio is the Cincinnati limestone, the geologically oldest rock exposed in the state. It is of Lower Silurian age and underlies the blue-grass country of Kentucky. The Silurian and Devonian deposits in the W., and the Carboniferous in the centre and E., occupy nearly the whole of the state, the surface of which is extensively covered with glacial gravels and other forms of glacial drift. The mineral resources of Ohio are mainly represented by her vast deposits of coal (most largely produced in the cos. of Jackson, Hocking, Athens, Perry, Guernsey, Belmont, and Stark), the beds of iron-ore (spathic and other forms) associated with the coal deposits, and the abundant supply of petroleum. They comprise also salt (obtained from springs), building sandstones (Masillon, Dayton), grindstones (Berea, Amherst, etc.), marble, gypsum (Sandusky), brick- and pottery-clays (Mineral Point), etc. The production of coal in 1903 was 24,838,103 short tons, valued at $31,932,327; of iron-ore, 29,688 tons (all carbonates); of petroleum, 20,480,286 barrels, valued at $26,234,521. The output of clay products was valued at $25,208,128, giving the state first position in this production. The state is rich in natural gas and in 1903 stood fourth in rank as a producer.

Agriculture.—In nearly every branch of agricultural industry Ohio occupies a leading position. Excepting the steep bluff sides, there is very little inarable land; and the only unproductive soils are certain shaly argillaceous outcrops of the upper and middle coal measures. The "Western Reserve," in the NE., is a famous dairy and stock-growing region. The dairy products, including the butter and cheese made on the farms, as well as the output obtained from milk sent to the factories, is very large. Ohio's wool-clip is one of the largest in the United States, the SE. section being especially adapted to this product. The washed and unwashed wool obtained in 1900 was 15,838,369 pounds. The Miami, Scioto, and Muskingum river-bottoms, largely underlaid by the self-fertilizing soil derived from the highly fossiliferous Cincinnati limestone, are splendidly adapted to the production of Indian corn. The Muskingum and Maumee valleys are famous wheat-growing sections. The steep river-fronts on the southern border and the shores and islands of Lake Erie produce much wine, which ranks with the best American vintages. The Western Reserve and the Miami Valley are noted for their apples, while the entire Lake region is particularly adapted to the growth of fruit. Ohio is one of the leading states in the cultivation of potatoes. Tobacco is an important crop. Many of the best lands in the state were called "barrens" by the early settlers and were supposed to be too dry to have much value. The chief agricultural crops in 1900 were: wheat, 8,523,876 bushels; corn, 106,890,188 bushels; oats, 40,340,534 bushels; barley, 622,566 bushels; rye, 513,023 bushels; buckwheat, 147,632 bushels; potatoes, 12,561,584 bushels; and hay, 1,652,797 tons.

Manufactures.—Having abundant water-power, coal, iron-ore, wool, timber, and other raw materials, it was inevitable that Ohio should become a great manufacturing state. In the iron- and steel-industry Ohio holds the second place in the Union. For the iron product she has employed not only her own excellent spathic ores, but has drawn largely upon the vast deposits about Lake Superior, her own block and coking coals having special fitness for the iron-industry. Cleveland, Youngstown, Massillon, Lorain, and the Ohio River towns are principal seats of the iron and steel manufacture, which embraces castings, rolled and forged work, Bessemer steel, sheet-iron work, wire and wire goods, nails, pigs, bridge-work, rails, general machinery and foundry products, etc. Other important industries are pork-packing, oil-refining, the extraction of linseed and lard oil, the production of flour- and grist-mill products, factory-cheese, beer, malt, whiskey, wine and brandy, the sawing of lumber, and the manufacture of boxes, cars, carriages, farming-implements, clothing, furniture, leather, boots, shoes, harness, cement, lime, fire-brick, pottery, paints, salt, porcelain, brick, glass (including plate- and stained-glass), chemicals, food preparations, soap, candles, and paper. The quantity of pig-iron manufactured in 1900 was 2,470,911 long tons; of wire-nails (in 1899), 2,083,646 kegs; of Bessemer steel (ingots), 1,679,237 long tons. Cleveland ranks among the leading ship-building places of the world. The number of tobacco-manufactories in 1899 was 2324, whose product was 604,097,171 cigars, 9,730,400 pounds of plug tobacco, and 8,627,672 pounds of other forms of tobacco. The Rookwood pottery, made at Cincinnati, is famous. The values of the products of the leading industries in 1900 were: iron and steel, $138,935,256; foundry- and machine-shop products, $72,399,632; flouring- and grist-mill products, $37,390,367; liquors, $31,771,591; slaughtering, $20,660,780; lumber and timber products, $20,790,854; boots and shoes, $17,920,854; men's clothing, $16,593,824; tobacco, $20,832,629; agricultural implements, $13,975,268.

The fisheries of Lake Erie are important. Many million pounds of fresh lake fish are annually sold in the Lake markets at first hand. The river Maumee is one of the most prolific fish-producing streams in the United States. The manufacture of caviare and smoked sturgeon has become an important industry.

Commerce is greatly facilitated by the extent of the lake- and river-fronts of Ohio. With the variety of natural and manufactured products Ohio has an extensive commerce, but from her geographical position it is mainly inter-state and domestic in character. Many sailing vessels and steamers owned in the state are engaged in lake and river traffic. Toledo, Sandusky, and Cleveland, on Lake Erie, are ports of entry, Conneaut is a subport of entry, and Fairport and Columbus are ports of delivery. The principal canals of the state are the Ohio Canal, uniting Cleveland and Portsmouth; the Miami and Erie, uniting Cincinnati and Toledo; the Hocking, uniting Carroll with Nelsonville; and the Walhonding, uniting Rochester with Roscoe.

Railroads.—The first railroad (the Mad River R.) was begun in 1835. In 1841 there were 36 miles in operation; in 1846, 129 miles; in 1850, 575 miles; in 1860, 2946 miles; in 1870, 3538 miles; in 1880, 5792 miles; in 1890, 7988 miles, without counting sidings and extra tracks; and in 1900, 8920 miles.

The counties are 88 in number,—viz., Adams, Allen, Ashland, Ashtabula, Athens, Auglaize, Belmont, Brown, Butler, Carroll, Champaign, Clark, Clermont, Clinton, Columbiana, Coshocton, Crawford, Cuyahoga, Darke, Defiance, Delaware, Erie, Fairfield, Fayette, Franklin, Fulton, Gallia, Geauga, Greene, Guernsey, Hamilton, Hancock, Hardin, Harrison, Henry, Highland, Hocking, Holmes, Huron, Jackson, Jefferson, Knox, Lake, Lawrence, Licking, Logan, Lorain, Lucas, Madison, Mahoning, Marion, Medina, Meigs, Mercer, Miami, Monroe, Montgomery, Morgan, Morrow, Muskingum, Noble, Ottawa, Paulding, Perry, Pickaway, Pike, Portage, Preble, Putnam, Richland, Ross, Sandusky, Scioto, Seneca, Shelby, Stark, Summit, Trumbull, Tuscarawas, Union, Van Wert, Vinton, Warren, Washington, Wayne, Williams, Wood, Wyandot.

Cities and Towns.—The principal cities and towns are Cleveland (pop. in 1900, 381,768), Cincinnati (325,902), Toledo (131,822), Columbus, the capital (125,560), Dayton (85,333), Youngstown (44,885), Akron (42,728), Springfield (38,253), Canton (30,667), Zanesville (23,538), Sandusky (19,664), etc.

Government, etc.—The governor and most of the state officers are chosen for a term of 2 years. The legislature consists of a senate and a house of representatives, the members of both houses being elected for 2 years. The state sends 21 representatives to the lower house of Congress.

Education.—A liberal and effective system of public instruction prevails in Ohio. The seats of the principal colleges and academic institutions are Akron (Buchtel College), Athens (Ohio University), Berea, Cincinnati (University of Cincinnati, Hebrew Union College, etc.), Cleveland (Adelbert College, Cleveland Medical College, and College for Women of Western Reserve University, the Case School of Applied Science, etc.), Columbus, Delaware (Ohio Wesleyan University), Gambier (Kenyon College), Glendale, Granville (Denison University, etc.), Hiram (Hiram College), Marietta (Marietta College), New Athens, New Concord, Oberlin (Oberlin College), Oxford (Miami University), Richmond, Rio Grande, Scio, Springfield, Tiffin, Toledo, Urbana, Westerville, Wilmington, Wooster (University of Wooster), and Yellow Springs (Antioch College). The state university is located at Columbus. There are numerous normal schools and colleges and independent schools of medicine, theology, science, etc.

Population.—Northern Ohio was principally settled by immigrants from New England and New York, and the central and southern parts by natives of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia. Pop. in 1800, 45,635; in 1810, 230,760; in 1820, 581,245; in 1830, 937,903; in 1840, 1,519,467; in 1850, 1,980,329; in 1860, 2,339,511; in 1870, 2,665,260; in 1880, 3,198,062; in 1890, 3,672,316; and in 1900, 4,157,545, including 458,734 foreign-born and 96,901 negroes.

History.—The possession of the region to the N. and W. of the Ohio River was a subject of dispute between the British and French until at the close of the French and Indian War, in 1763, France relinquished it to England. By the treaty of Paris, in 1783, it passed into the possession of the United States. Virginia and Connecticut claimed portions of what is now Ohio, but they were induced to relinquish their claims to jurisdiction. In 1787 the region became a part of the Northwest Territory. In 1788 a party of New Englanders, under the auspices of the Ohio Company, settled at Marietta, the oldest town in the state. The beginnings of the settlement of Cincinnati reach back to the same year. The Indian wars were signalized by the defeat of Harmar (1790) and St. Clair (1791), and the great victory of Wayne, at Fallen Timbers, on the Maumee (1794), which established tranquillity. The extensive tract known as the Western Reserve, in the NE. corner of the present state, the proprietorship in whose soil was vested in the state of Connecticut, attracted many settlers from New England. In 1803 the state entered the Union. Lake Erie was the scene of important naval operations in the war of 1812, witnessing Perry's victory in Sept., 1813. The completion of the Erie Canal, in 1825, first established easy communication between Ohio and the Atlantic seaboard. Ohio has given three presidents to the United States,—Hayes, Garfield, and McKinley.

Oklahoma, ōk-lą-hō'mąh, a territory of the United States, bounded N. by Kansas and Colorado, E. by Indian Territory, S. by Indian Territory and Texas, and W. by Texas and New Mexico. The territory comprises what once formed the western part of Indian Territory together with the narrow strip N. of the Texas Panhandle. This latter section, formerly known as the Public Land Strip (or "No Man's Land"), was ceded to the United States by Texas in 1850, but in fixing the boundaries during the territorial legislation which followed this strip was left out, and for forty years was without a name and without law, though it was often erroneously represented on the maps as forming a part of Indian Territory. The northern boundary of the territory is the parallel of 37° N. lat. The area of the land surface of Oklahoma is 38,830 sq. m.; of the appertaining waters, 200 sq. m.

Surface.—Oklahoma is generally a rolling plain of 900–2500 feet elevation, rising to the W., where it forms part of the Great Plains. The narrow strip lying N. of Texas is in greater part an arid plateau region, which in the dry summer season is often covered with saline efflorescence. The river valleys are fertile and the land is generally well adapted to stock-raising. The highest land is in the extreme NW. where an elevation of nearly 5000 feet seems to be reached. On the rolling plains there are few trees and the streams have in many cases cut deep cañons below the general level. In the S. between the Canadian and Red rivers (the latter forming the southern boundary-line with Texas) are the Wichita Mountains, of considerable elevation. They are continuous with the hills in Indian Territory and constitute a sort of connecting link between the Ozark Mountains of Arkansas and Missouri and the Rocky Mountains. The central part of the territory is occupied by the Chautauqua Mountains.

Rivers.—The important streams are the Arkansas, with the Cimarron, Canadian, and other branches, in the northern and central portions, and the Red River with its affluents, which drain the southern section. Many of these streams are nearly or wholly waterless in summer.

Climate, Minerals.—The climate is mild and generally healthful, though in the SW. there are tracts of marshy land where fevers are not uncommon. The summers are hot, sometimes exceptionally so, with the mercury rising to 110°–115°, and the winters, although usually not rigorous, also show extremes of cold (—20° or even —25°). The rainfall is moderate, averaging annually about 31 inches, but rising in some places to nearly 50 inches. There is a liability to droughts and the country is subject to dust, high winds, and "northers" (or cold wind-storms from the north), which develop rapidly and often prevail for a day or two at a time. Much of the water is alkaline or salty and unfit for drinking. In the W. and NW. there are extensive deposits of gypsum and salt and there is much good building stone. Good coal is found in Pawnee co. and in the Osage Reservation and there are indications of a fair amount of mineral wealth in the tract included in the Comanche Reservation. Gold, silver, copper, petroleum, and natural gas have been obtained in minor quantities.

Agriculture.—Much of the land is well suited for agriculture, and favorable results have been obtained from the cultivation of the cereals. The leading crops in 1900 were: wheat, 18,657,373 bushels; corn, 14,144,052 bushels. Considerable fruit, especially the peach, is grown. Stock-raising, particularly in the western sections, has developed into an important industry. The amount of washed and unwashed wool obtained from the wool-clip of 1900 was 218,916 pounds.

Education.—School laws were enacted at the first meeting of the legislature. A territorial university has been established at Norman, normal schools at Alva and Edmund, and an agricultural and mechanical college at Stillwater. There are also the Epworth University at Oklahoma (city), Langston University for colored, at Langston, and Chilocco Industrial School for Indians, in Kay co.

Political Divisions and Population.—At the time of organization the territory contained seven counties. This number was later increased, and the new counties were designated by letters, but they now all bear names. There were, in 1900, 23 counties,—viz., Beaver, Blaine, Canadian, Cleveland, Custer, Day, Dewey, Garfield, Grant, Greer (formerly claimed by Texas), Kay, Kingfisher, Lincoln, Logan, Noble, Oklahoma, Pawnee, Payne, Pottawatomie, Roger Mills, Washita, Woods, and Woodward, with several Indian reservations. Comanche and Kiowa counties have been organized since the official census. Pop. in 1890, 61,834; in 1900, 398,331. The number of Indians on the reservations (Kaws, Kiowas, Comanches, Osages, and Wichitas) in 1900 was 13,873. The chief towns are Oklahoma (pop. 10,037), Guthrie (10,006), Shawnee (3462), El Reno, Perry, Stillwater, Kingfisher, Blackwell, and Norman. The population of most of the towns has very greatly increased since the official census. The length of operating lines of railway in 1900 was 899. The capital is Guthrie.

History.—Oklahoma, an Indian word for "beautiful land," was the name given to the western part of Indian Territory ceded by the Indians to the United States in 1866. The treaties under which these lands were released stipulated that they were to be used by the government for the settlement of other Indian tribes or freedmen, but were not to be open to whites. From time to time after this cession, various tribes were located in different parts of this region, but much of the land remained unoccupied, and before very long speculators and adventurers in the surrounding states were stimulated with a desire to possess it. Under the guidance of energetic leaders parties of so-called "boomers" entered the territory with the intention of securing homes, and the military force of the United States had finally to be employed against them. In 1885 Congress authorized the president to open negotiations with the Creeks, Seminoles, and Cherokees for the purpose of opening the unassigned lands to settlement by the whites. Early in 1889 arrangements were concluded with the Creeks and Seminoles, by which, in consideration of the payment by the government of several million dollars, the clause forbidding settlement by white citizens on the lands ceded by them in 1866 was cancelled. The area which thus became the absolute property of the government amounted to 5,440,000 acres. The lands were thrown open for settlement on April 22, 1889, when a mad rush was made to take possession of them. The creation of a new district with a population of 50,000 persons, in a single day, was a novelty even in the history of the rapid development of the West. Oklahoma Territory was organized in 1890. While Oklahoma was subject to the invasions of the boomers, settlers had gradually taken up their abode in No Man's Land. When Oklahoma was formed this section was made one of the counties of the new territory. In 1891 the land acquired from the Sacs and Foxes, the Iowas, and Pottawatomies was thrown open for settlement. The Cherokees did not accept the terms offered by the government until 1893, when the United States acquired the ownership of 6,000,000 acres, constituting the famous "Cherokee Outlet." The scenes which were characteristic of the first rush for the new land were re-enacted when this long-coveted Cherokee Strip was thrown open to the throngs waiting along its borders.

Oldenburg, ol'dẹn-bōōrg', a state of the German Empire, in the NW., with the title of grand-duchy. It is composed of three separate portions: 1, the duchy of Oldenburg, which forms seven-eighths of the territory and is bounded by Hanover on the E., S., and W., and on the N. by the North Sea; 2, the principality of Lübeck (capital, Eutin), enclosed by Holstein, Prussia; and 3, the principality of Birkenfeld, enclosed by Rhenish Prussia. Area, 2479 sq. m. Pop. in 1867, 315,995; in 1890, 354,968; in 1900, 399,183.

The duchy of Oldenburg belongs to the basin of the North Sea and is level. The northern portion, known as the Marsh (Ger. Marsch), is largely protected against inundation by dikes. Almost the whole of the Marsh is utilized for agriculture and pasture. The bulk of the duchy, known as the Geest, consists of infertile land, much of it being moorland and heath. The chief rivers are the Weser, the left bank of which belongs to Oldenburg from Bremen to the sea, the Hunte, an affluent of the Weser, and the Haase, an affluent of the Ems. The climate of Oldenburg resembles that of the Netherlands, being temperate and humid. The agricultural holdings are in the main very small. The leading crops include cereals, hay, potatoes, and beans. Cattle, swine, sheep, and poultry are extensively reared. Bee-keeping is a considerable industry. In the manufacturing industry Oldenburg holds a very inferior position. The constitution of Oldenburg provides for a single representative chamber, the Landtag, whose members are chosen by indirect election. The principalities of Lübeck and Birkenfeld have their own provincial councils. The grand-duchy has 1 vote in the German Bundesrat and sends 3 members to the Reichstag. The capital is Oldenburg. The bulk of the inhabitants are Protestants. There are numerous descendants of the old Frisians. The history of Oldenburg as a state under that name reaches back to about the beginning of the twelfth century, when it first appears as a petty countship. In 1448 Christian, count of Oldenburg, ascended the throne of Denmark. The country was under Danish rule from 1667 to 1773, when it passed under the rule of the house of Holstein-Gottorp. In 1777 the state was erected from a county into a duchy. In 1815 it was raised to the rank of a grand-duchy.

The chief towns on the shores of the lake are Oswego, Hamilton, Toronto, Whitby, Port Hope, and Kingston. The largest rivers that enter it, besides the Niagara, are the Genesee, Oswego, and Black rivers. It contains an abundance of fish. Lake Ontario was named Lake St. Louis by Champlain, and for a time it was known as Lake Frontenac.

Ontario, formerly Upper Canada, or Canada West, a province of the Dominion of Canada, bounded on the NE. and E. by the province of Quebec, SE. by New York, on the W. and NW. by Manitoba and Keewatin, and on the S. by the Great Lakes (and their connecting waters) and Minnesota. Its most northerly part extends to James Bay (Hudson Bay). Area of the land-surface, 219,650 sq. m.

The surface of the country is diversified by rivers and lakes, a main water-shed separating the waters of the Ottawa from those of the St. Lawrence and a minor one dividing the streams flowing into Lake Simcoe and Lake Huron from those flowing into lakes Erie and Ontario. There are few marked prominences, and seemingly no portion of the province rises above 2000 feet. In general the surface lies below 1200 feet and continues the Laurentian Highland, with its partially bared and glaciated rocks and extensive deposits of till (or drift). In the Ontario peninsula between Lake Huron on the NW. and lakes Ontario and Erie on the SE., is the most fertile and thickly populated portion of the province and of the entire dominion.

The principal rivers of Ontario are: the St. Lawrence; the tributaries of the Ottawa; the French, Maganetawan, Severn, and Nottawasaga, falling into Georgian Bay; the Saugeen, Maitland, and Aux Sables, falling into the main body of Lake Huron; the Thames, running SW. into Lake St. Clair; the Grand, flowing SE. into Lake Erie; the Trent, in part of its course called the Otonabee, and the Moira, flowing SE. into the Bay of Quinte; and the Niagara, falling into Lake Ontario. The Ottawa forms part of its NE. boundary. In the NW. Algoma district the rivers include the Abbitibbi and Albany (both tributary to Hudson Bay) and the English. The lakes of Ontario are numerous, the aggregate area of the waters belonging to the province, not counting the larger lakes which receive its waters (Superior, Huron, Erie, and Ontario), is estimated at 2350 sq. m. Among the minor lakes are Nipigon, Simcoe, and Nipissing. The Lake of the Woods is in the extreme northwest. The principal bays are the Georgian, Nottawasaga, Owen Sound, Long Point, Burlington, and Quinte.

The climate of Ontario is not one of very great extremes in its more southerly parts, and the influence of the Great Lakes is by no means insignificant. At Toronto the lowest temperature is about —8°; the maximum, 89°. The annual rainfall over the province ranges from about 30 to 40 inches. The flora is in the northern parts largely of a sub-Arctic type, but in the peninsular region of the S. the vegetation is that of the belt of deciduous trees of Ohio and New York. Less than one-half of the great forests of spruce, pine, and hemlock which at one time covered the province now remains. Northern Ontario is still important as a fur-yielding country, and supplies quantities of the pelts of the otter, mink, and skunk. The moose, caribou, wolf, fox, and bear are a part of the mammalian fauna.

The agricultural resources of the country are very great. Immense crops of wheat are raised, also oats, barley, Indian corn, rye, potatoes, turnips, etc. The apple-orchards of the southwestern counties are very productive, and pears, plums, grapes, cherries, and various kinds of berries thrive. The chief agricultural crops in 1900 were: wheat, 31,316,070 bushels; oats, 89,693,327 bushels; and barley, 16,909,751 bushels.

The mineral wealth of the country is very rich and varied, and comprises iron, copper, silver, lead, gold, nickel, plumbago, antimony, arsenic, manganese, petroleum, and rock-salt. The production of gold in 1900 was $421,000; of silver in 1899, 105,467 ounces; nickel (from the Sudbury region, one of the most productive in the world) in 1901, 9,189,000 pounds, valued at $4,594,000; and of pig-iron in 1899, 64,749 net tons, valued at $808,157. The production of copper, which is very abundant in the shore-region of lakes Superior and Huron, reached in 1898 upward of 8,000,000 pounds. Ontario furnishes the greater part of the petroleum produced in the Dominion, and the product has been in some years as high as 30,000,000 gallons.

The principal articles manufactured are cloth, linen, furniture, sawn timber, iron and hardware, paper, soap, starch, hats, caps, boots, shoes, leather, cotton and woollen goods, steam engines and locomotives, sewing-machines, woodenware of all descriptions, agricultural implements, wagons and carriages, etc. The railway system has made rapid strides in Ontario. In 1852 there was not a single mile in operation in the province; in 1900 the mileage was 6812. The principal canals are the Welland, between lakes Erie and Ontario, to avoid the Niagara Falls; the Rideau, between Kingston and Ottawa; and the St. Lawrence canals, rendered necessary by the rapids of that river.

The public affairs of the province are administered by a lieutenant-governor, an executive council, and a legislative assembly of 98 members.

Ontario is divided into numerous counties and a number of sections which are specifically designated districts. The names of the districts are: Algoma, Muskoka, Nipissing, Parry Sound, and Rainy River. Pop. in 1901, 2,182,947. Ontario is the most populous province in the Dominion. The principal cities are Toronto (the capital, with a population in 1901 of 208,040), Ottawa (the capital of the Dominion, with a population of 59,928), Hamilton, London, and Kingston. The leading educational institutions are the University of Toronto, Victoria University (federated with the preceding), Wycliffe and St. Michael's Colleges (affiliated with the University of Toronto), and the Ontario Agricultural College at Guelph.

The province contains many objects of interest to the tourist, among which are the Thousand Islands of the St. Lawrence, the Great Lakes, the Falls of Niagara, and the Falls of Kakabikka, on the river Kaministiquia, 30 miles from its outlet into Lake Superior.

In 1867, under the Act of Confederation, Upper Canada was constituted the province of Ontario. See CANADA.

Oporto, o-POR'to (i.e., "the port;" L. Portus Cale), the second city of Portugal in population and importance, capital of a district of its own name, situated on the right bank of the river Douro, 3 miles from its mouth and 175 miles NNE. of Lisbon. Lat. 41° 9′ N.; lon. 8° 45′ W. It extends two miles along the N. bank of the river, the streets rising picturesquely in terraces one above the other, while on the opposite side of the Douro is the suburb of Villa Nova de Gaia, with villas, convents, grain-elevators, and immense warehouses for storing wine. The city contains numerous squares (campos, praças), of which the Praça de Dom Pedro, with the town-hall (or Casa de Camara), forms the business centre of the town. Numerous gardens, chief of which are the Jardim da Cordoaría and the Jardim de São Lázaro, afford beautiful displays of the luxuriant vegetation of the region. The most conspicuous public buildings include the general hospital, town-hall, the cathedral, or Sé (occupying an eminence formerly the site of an ancient castle of the Suevi), the episcopal palace, the English Factory House (a club-building of white granite), exchange, Crystal Palace (the building of the industrial exposition of 1865), mint, and opera-house. Many of the dwellings have gardens attached. The sculptured fountains are an attractive feature of the city. One of the most striking architectural objects in Oporto is the Torre dos Clerigos ("Tower of the Clergy," 246 feet in height), attached to the Igreja (church) dos Clerigos.

Oporto is the seat of a medical college, schools of commerce and navigation, and other superior schools, and has numerous hospitals, a public library, containing 150,000 volumes, a municipal museum, polytechnic institute, gallery of paintings, commercial association, etc. The most interesting structure of Oporto is the Ponte de Dom Luiz Primeiro, an iron-girder bridge, one of the most graceful structures of its kind in the world, which crosses the Douro in a single arch of 560 feet span. Oporto is the chief industrial centre of Portugal. Silk-factories are established in and around the city, which has also ship-building yards, breweries, distilleries, and sugar-refineries, and manufactures of woollen, linen, and cotton goods, shawls, leather, earthenware, steel and iron goods, paper, wax, tobacco, and soap.

The harbor is accessible from the sea for vessels of small draft only, owing to a bar at the mouth of the Douro. The fine new Atlantic harbor of Leixões is about 4 miles N. of the mouth of the river. The Douro is subject to dangerous freshets by the rains or melting of the mountain-snows. The principal trade of Oporto is in port wine, to which it gives the name. The lesser articles of export include oil, olives, sumach, lemons, oranges, refined sugar, salt, and cork. The climate of Oporto suffers from chilling fogs. Pop. in 1900, 172,421.

Oran, o'rån' (Fr. pron. ō'rŎNⁿ'), a fortified town of Algeria, capital of the department of Oran, 266 miles by rail WSW. of Algiers, on the Mediterranean. Lat. 35° 44′ N.; lon. 0° 39′ W. It is situated at the foot of a hill called Sainte Croix, at the mouth of a small stream. Its climate is extremely hot but healthy. The new town is well laid out and substantially built, with the aspect of cities in France. It has a museum and library, Catholic cathedral, and a notable mosque. The harbor is but indifferently good, but the port of Mers-el-Kebir, 3 miles distant, is one of the best in Algeria and admits large vessels. The city has some manufactures, an important wine-industry, and exports grain, flour, wine, brandy, esparto grass, cattle, sheep, goats, wool, and hides. Oran was taken by the Spaniards in 1509 and abandoned in 1792, soon after the destruction of the place by earthquakes. Under the Spaniards it was greatly embellished and surrounded by strong fortifications. It was occupied by the French in 1831. It is a bishop's see. Pop. in 1901, 89,253, of whom 42,257 were French.

Orange, or Gariep, går-eep', the largest river of southern Africa, forming in part the boundary between Cape Colony on one side and the Orange River Colony, Griqualand West, British Bechuanaland, and German Southwest Africa on the other, rises in the Drakenberg, in Basutoland, at an elevation of upward of 10,000 feet, flows W., and enters the Atlantic near lat. 28° 38′ S. Its banks abound in ebony, mimosa, and willow-trees, but much of the country near it is an irreclaimable desert. Its shallow waters, bars, and rapids render it practically unfit for navigation. Chief affluents, the Vaal and Caledon on the right and the Hartebeest on the left. Length, about 1100 miles.

Orange (Fr. pron. o'rŎNzh'; anc. Arau'sio), a town of France, capital of an arrondissement in the department of Vaucluse, on the Aigue, 12 miles N. of Avignon. Its chief interest is derived from its fine Roman remains, including a magnificent triumphal arch, decorated with beautiful bas-reliefs; a vast theatre, now partially restored, with its ancient stage in an excellent state of perservation; and the ruins of the circus. The principal modern structure is the church of Notre Dame, dating from the eleventh century. The industries of the town comprise the manufacture of textiles, dyeing, and tanning. Orange was the capital of a principality of the same name which passed about the middle of the sixteenth century into the possession of the house of Nassau. William the Silent, the great leader of the Dutch in their rising against Spain, and his son and successor, Maurice of Nassau, made the house of Orange illustrious. William III., of this dynasty, ruled both England and Holland. On his death, in 1702, the rule of the house of Nassau in the principality terminated and in 1713 it was awarded to France by the treaty of Utrecht. The royal family of the Netherlands is still known as the house of Orange. Pop. in 1901, 6470 (commune, 10,096).

Orange River Colony, formerly the Orange Free State, a colonial possession of Great Britain in southern Africa, has for its chief boundaries Griqualand West, the Transvaal Colony, Natal, Basutoland, and Cape Colony. Area, according to latest estimates, 48,326 sq. m. The surface is a plateau, mountainous in the E. and S. and sloping W. from the Drakenberg range, which separates the region from Natal on the E. Mean altitude, about 4400 feet. The important rivers are the Vaal and Orange, on the N. and S. boundaries respectively, to which the Modder, Sand, Caledon, and other rivers are tributary. The climate is on the whole pleasant and healthful, with the temperature ranging from 40° (or less) to 95° (January). Agriculture and stock-raising are the chief industries; large tracts have excellent grazing-lands; only a small portion is suitable for agriculture, but considerable grain is raised. The diamond product in 1898 was valued at £1,508,661; the Kimberley mines are just across the W. boundary. The imports (clothing, groceries, and iron and steel goods) amounted to £1,190,932 in 1898; the exports (diamonds, agricultural products, hides, and skins), to £1,923,425. The colony had in 1904 about 460 miles of railway. Capital, Bloemfontein. Pop. in 1890, 207,503, of whom 77,716 were whites. The Boers established a republic here in 1854. The country as a result of the Anglo-Boer war was officially transformed by proclamation from the Orange Free State into a possession of the British Crown in May, 1900.

Oregon, or'e-gŏn, one of the Pacific states of the American Union, bounded N. by Washington, E. by Idaho, S. by Nevada and California, and W. by the Pacific Ocean. The northern border is washed by the Columbia River, except to the eastward of the point where that stream first reaches lat. 46° N., which parallel completes the northern limit of the state; on the E. the Snake River forms a portion of the boundary, while the southern limit is lat. 42° N. Area of the land-surface, 94,560 sq. m.; of the appertaining waters, 1470 sq. m.

Face of the Country.—The coastal strip of Oregon is mountainous and broken, terminating in bold sea-cliffs and passing interiorly into a partial plateau which is densely timbered, except in the S., where the "bald hills" rise in an open prairie-like region with groves of timber. This tract is bounded eastward by the Coast and Umpqua ranges. Between these ranges on the W. and the great Cascade Range on the E. lie the fertile Willamette Valley and the upper basins of the Umpqua and Rogue rivers,—the three river-basins being separated by the transverse Calapooya and Rogue River mountains. The W. flank of the Cascade Range is a densely timbered and greatly broken region, of which only the valleys are arable. These mountains present many cones of but recently extinct volcanoes. Mount Hood, the loftiest of these, situated about 45 miles SE. of Portland, attains an elevation of 11,225 feet. Other lofty summits are Pitt, 9760 ft.; Diamond Peak, 8807 ft.; and Scott, 7123 ft. E. of the Cascade Range the country, embracing two-thirds of the state, is open, dry, and admirably adapted to pastoral pursuits. It is a rolling country, in some parts traversed by deep cañons and elsewhere by mountain-ranges and ridges of volcanic rock. In the NE. is the beautiful Grande Ronde, a valley with 275,000 acres of fertile land, surrounded by well-timbered mountains. This is the northernmost of a series of similar valleys enclosed by the Blue Mountains and their eastern spurs. There are also great sage-plains and large marshes occur in the Klamath Valley and elsewhere.

The coast-line extends more than 300 miles N. and S. On it are Tillamook, False Tillamook, Yaquina, and Coos bays, besides which the mouths of the Columbia, Umpqua, Coquille, and Rogue rivers afford harbor facilities.

Rivers.—The principal rivers are the Columbia, which borders the state for 300 miles and affords extensive steam navigation, and its tributaries, direct and indirect,—the Willamette, Calapooya, Santiam, Clackamas, Yamhill, Tualatin, etc., all west of the Cascade Range, affording some steam navigation; and E. of the Cascade Range the Des Chutes, John Day, Umatilla, Walla Walla, and Snake, the last receiving the Grande Ronde, Powder, Burnt, Malheur, and Owyhee. A considerable area in this state sends no water to the sea, since it lies in the Great Basin. Here are Malheur, Harney, Christmas, Abert, Goose, and Summer lakes, and westward are several lakes (the Klamath Lakes) which lie in the Upper Klamath Valley.

Geology, Minerals.—The Cascade Range, geographically continuous with the Sierra Nevada of California, is almost everywhere overlaid with volcanic rocks. In the valleys of the Snake and Owyhee the formation is also largely volcanic, and, indeed, nearly the whole eastern section of the state may be said to be a vast volcanic plateau. The western valleys are chiefly of Tertiary and Quaternary age; but there are well-characterized Cretaceous areas, mainly in the Des Chutes, John Day, and Rogue River valleys. The ridge between Coos Bay and the Coquille River contains valuable lignitic coal of Cretaceous or Tertiary age and outcrops of the same mineral occur at many other points. The amount of coal mined in the state in 1903 was 91,144 short tons, valued at $221,031. Gold is found both E. and W. of the Cascade Range, occurring in quartz and placer deposits; argentiferous galena and native silver occur at various points. Ores of copper and iron are very abundant and have a wide range. The output of gold for the year 1903 was 62,411 fine ounces, valued at $1,412,208; of silver, 118,000 fine ounces, valued at $63,720. Potter's clay, glass-sand, granite, marble, sandstone, slate, steatite, and other mineral substances of economic value are plentiful.

Climate.—The climate of western Oregon is much like that of England, but milder in winter, except in elevated places. The rainfall is abundant and in many places excessive, ranging as high as 100 and even 140 inches per year. E. of the Cascade Mountains the rainfall is markedly deficient, falling to 12 or even 6 inches, and the climate is generally pleasant, although with extremes of summer (100°–110°) and winter (—25°) temperatures. Live-stock seldom needs winter foddering or careful shelter, although the last is desirable in the rainy season.

Fauna and Flora.—The animals differ widely from those of the Atlantic states; but the grizzly and the black bear, the deer, prong-horn, big-horn, Rocky Mountain goat, coyote, panther, etc., as representatives of the more familiar forms of the mammalian fauna, represent species found widely dispersed on the continent. Salmon and trout are common in the streams, and the annual catch of the former is very large and lucrative, especially on the Columbia River. Other fishes of economic importance are several herrings and smelts, the halibut, and the cod (incorrectly so called). There is much and widely varied furred and feathered game.

The principal mountain-ranges and nearly all the western valleys and plateaus are densely wooded with giant trees. Here grow several species of pine, cedar, and fir, the cypress, redwood, larch, spruce, juniper, yew, chestnut, maple, oak, ash, and alder; and eastward there are willows, poplars, birches, and some coniferous trees. Coniferous trees predominate and give tone to the landscape. The cutting and sawing of lumber and the export of timber and spars afford employment to much capital, and the Douglas spruce furnishes the best masts and spars in the world. The quantity of lumber cut in 1899 was 669,650,000 feet, valued at $6,228,250. Among native fruits are the currant, gooseberry, blackberry, raspberry, strawberry, and grape. The various bunch grasses and the white sage of the E. afford excellent pasturage.

Objects of Interest to Tourists.—The scenery on the lower Columbia is everywhere of a grand, though gloomy, character. The Dalles and the Cascades, the Falls of the Willamette and of Silver Creek, the great cone of Mount Hood, the mountain cliffs and gorges, the cañons and the snow-clad peaks, the numerous limpid lakes and thermal salt and mineral springs, broken lava-deserts and beautiful pastoral valleys, are among the infinite variety of interesting objects to be found in this state.

Agriculture.—Western Oregon is specially adapted to wool-growing, cattle-breeding, and the growth of the best grades of winter wheat, barley, and oats. Hay is produced abundantly. Indian corn does not thrive, the summers being too cool. The state ranks second in the production of hops, chiefly grown in the Willamette Valley, and in the quality of its temperate fruits holds a leading position. The main fruit-growing region is the area between the Coast and Cascade ranges. The number of apple-trees in the state in 1900 was 2,825,898; plum- and prune-trees, 2,517,523. Peaches and figs grow in the southwest. The eastern valleys and plains are better adapted to grazing than to agriculture; but many tracts of excellent wheat-land are found there. In the Willamette Valley live-stock of every kind attains great perfection. Flax is cultivated for fibre and seed, and does admirably. The chief agricultural crops in 1900 were: wheat, 16,198,012 bushels; oats, 3,282,770 bushels; barley, 905,928 bushels; corn, 317,147 bushels; rye, 94,040 bushels; potatoes, 1,692,020 bushels; and hay, 1,677,085 tons. The quantity of washed and unwashed wool obtained from the wool-clip of 1900 was 18,810,192 pounds.

Manufactures.—The principal industries entering under this head are lumber-sawing, the tanning of leather, the making of boots, shoes, harness, and saddlery, the milling and reduction of ores, and the making of flour, furniture, liquors, wagons, cotton-seed and linseed oils, etc. The packing of beef and pork is an industry of some importance, far surpassed, however, by that of the fishing and canning of salmon, the product of which has an annual value of about $2,000,000. There is also some ship-building.

Railroads.—In 1862 there were 4 miles of railroad in operation; in 1870, 159 miles; in 1880, 508 miles; in 1890, 1455 miles; and in 1900, 1695 miles.

The counties are 33 in number,—viz., Baker, Benton, Clackamas, Clatsop, Columbia, Coos, Crook, Curry, Douglas, Gilliam, Grant, Harney, Jackson, Josephine, Klamath, Lake, Lane, Lincoln, Linn, Malheur, Marion, Morrow, Multnomah, Polk, Sherman, Tillamook, Umatilla, Union, Wallowa, Wasco, Washington, Wheeler, and Yamhill. The principal towns are Portland, on the Willamette (pop. in 1900, 90,426); Astoria (8381); Baker City, a mining supply-centre (6663); Pendleton (4406); Salem, the capital (4258); The Dalles (3542); Oregon City (3494), etc.

Education.—Eugene is the seat of the University of Oregon. Among other colleges are the Pacific University, at Forest Grove (Congregational); McMinnville College (Baptist); Philomath College (United Brethren in Christ), at Philomath; Willamette University (Methodist), at Salem; Portland University, at University Park; Portland Academy, and St. Michael's College (Roman Catholic), at Portland. The state agricultural college is at Corvallis and there are state normal schools at Ashland, Drain, Monmouth, Gold Beach, and Weston.

Government, etc.—The governor and state officers are elected for a term of 4 years. The legislature consists of a senate and a house of representatives, the members of the former being elected for a term of 4 years and those of the latter for 2 years. The state has 2 representatives in the lower house of the national Congress.

Population.—Pop. in 1850, 13,294; in 1860, 52,465; in 1870, 90,923; in 1880, 174,768; in 1890, 313,767; and in 1900, 413,536. About one-sixth of the inhabitants in 1900 were foreign-born, including over 10,000 Chinese. There are several thousand Indians belonging to small tribes.

History.—The possession of the country to the N. of the Columbia River was disputed previous to 1846 by the United States and Great Britain. The claim of the United States to Oregon (and also Washington) was based upon the discoveries of Captain Gray, who had visited these regions towards the close of the eighteenth century (having been despatched by Boston merchants in quest of furs) and upon the Louisiana purchase (the Spaniards, the possessors of Louisiana from 1783 to 1800, having made explorations along these coasts). In 1846 the United States and Great Britain agreed upon the parallel of 49° N. as the boundary between their dominions in this quarter. In 1811 Astoria was founded by the Pacific Fur Company. Most of the early settlers were Canadian-French voyageurs, coureurs du bois, and trappers, and the Scottish traders of the Hudson Bay and Northwest Fur companies. The permanent settlement by Americans began soon after 1830. A large proportion of the early immigrants were from Missouri. Oregon was organized as a territory in 1848 and in 1859 it became a state.

Orinoco, o-re-no'ko, one of the principal rivers of South America, rises in several branches on the W. slope of the Sierra Parima, on the Brazilian frontier, winds successively W., N., and E. through the centre of Venezuela, and enters the Atlantic by numerous mouths, in lat. 8° 20'–10° N. Total course estimated at 1600 miles, of which about 900 miles below the cataract of Atures and 500 miles above the Maypures rapids are continuously navigable. Area of basin, about 350,000 sq. m. The principal affluents in descending order are from the left the united stream of the Atabapo and Guaviare, the Meta, the Arauca, and the Apure. Some of these tributaries are larger than the Danube. Those from the right are the Ventuari, which joins the Orinoco about 40 miles E. of the junction of the Atabapo, the Caura, and the Caroní. By the Cassiquiare, which leaves the upper course of this stream a short distance below Esmeralda, the Orinoco has a singular navigable communication with the Rio Negro and the Amazon. At 200 leagues from the ocean its breadth is about 3 miles and near Ciudad Bolívar (formerly Angostura), to which place the tide reaches, it is 4 miles across.

The cataracts of Atures and Maypures (or Apures), the one in lat. 5° 8′ N., the other about 36 miles lower down, consist of a countless number of little cascades succeeding one another like steps, where numerous islands and rocks so restrict the bed of the river that out of a breadth of 8000 feet there often remains an open channel only 20 feet in width. The waters of the Orinoco rise from April to October, attaining their greatest height in July and August. The vast plains through which the river flows are at this season to a great extent overflowed. Both banks of the stream are densely wooded and, like the river itself, full of animal life. The numerous channels by which the Orinoco finds its way to the sea begin to branch off from the main stream upward of 100 miles from the coast. The southernmost and widest of these branches runs almost directly E. and reaches the ocean by the mouth called Boca de Navíos (or Caño Navíos), between Point Barima on the S. and Crab Island on the N., which are more than 20 miles apart. In front of this mouth is a bar, on which is 17 ft. of water. In the month of April, when the water is lowest, the tides are perceptible in the river at Ciudad Bolívar, a distance of 225 miles from the sea. The other branches, which run N. and divide the delta of the Orinoco into numerous low islands, are imperfectly known. Despite its magnificent water-way the Orinoco is but little used in steamboat navigation. Large ocean steamers ascend to Ciudad Bolívar and minor steam-craft during the rainy season to the Apure.

Orkney Islands (L. Orcades, or'ka-dēz), an archipelago off the N. coast of Scotland, between lat. 58° 47′ and 59° 20′ N. and lon. 2° 4′ and 3° 23′ W., separated from the co. of Caithness by Pentland Firth. Area of the islands, which constitute a Scottish county, 375 sq. m. There are about 70 islands and islets, of which about 30 are inhabited: the principal are Pomona, or Mainland (207 sq. m.), South Ronaldshay, Hoy, Flotta, Graemsay, Eday, Rousay, Sanday, Shapinshay, Stronsay, and Westray. The islands are distinguished for their bold, rocky scenery, especially Hoy, where the Ward of Hoy rises to upward of 1500 feet and the "Old Man" to 450 feet. The climate is mild. Little snow falls in winter, but the summers are chilly and moist. Oats, barley, potatoes, and turnips are the chief crops. A small breed of cattle is reared, and many sheep pasture on the hills and common moors. Hunting for wild birds and eggs and fishing partly employ the population. The islands contain numerous prehistoric remains, especially round towers (or brochs). In the Middle Ages they were for a time ruled by Scandinavian jarls (earls), then belonged to Norway, and afterwards, for over two centuries, were ruled by Scottish lords who were vassals of the kings of Norway. In 1468 they passed to the Scottish crown and formed an earldom. Capital, Kirkwall. Pop. in 1901, 28,698. The Orkneys unite with the Shetlands to send 1 member to parliament.

Orleans, or'le-ąnz (Fr. Orléans, or'lȧ'ŏn'), a city of France, capital of the department of Loiret, and formerly capital of Orléannais, on the right bank of the Loire, here spanned by a handsome bridge, 75 miles SSW. of Paris. The old portion of the city still retains its narrow streets and many of its quaint and beautiful timbered houses, but the newer sections are well laid out, with broad avenues and handsome boulevards on the site of the former fortifications. Preëminent among the buildings of the town is the splendid late-Gothic cathedral of Ste. Croix (485 feet in length), with its imposing façade. Other notable edifices are the old Hôtel de Ville, containing the municipal museums of painting and sculpture and of natural history; the new Hôtel de Ville, dating from the sixteenth century; the Hôtel de Cabut, with a valuable historical museum; the prefecture; the Palais de Justice; and the Hôtel Dieu (municipal hospital). The house in which Joan of Arc is said to have resided contains an interesting museum devoted to her relics. The town possesses a municipal library of 70,000 volumes and a botanical garden. The equestrian statue of the Maid of Orleans and the monument to the Republic are fine sculptural works. Orleans was built on the ruins of the ancient Gallic town of Genabum, which was destroyed by Cæsar. It was named Aurelianum in honor of the Emperor Aurelian. Its episcopal see dates from a very early period. The town was of importance under the Merovingians. In 1428 the English laid siege to Orleans, which was relieved by Joan of Arc, an event which turned the tide in the great struggle between England and France. The town was taken by the Germans in Oct., 1870, was recovered by the French in November, and reoccupied by the enemy in December. Pop. in 1901, 57,320 (commune, 67,311).

Ottawa, ot'ta-wa, a river of Canada, the most important tributary of the St. Lawrence, rises near lat. 48° 30′ N., about 200 miles N. of the city of Ottawa. It flows at first westward, traverses Lake Temiscamingue, and then generally southeastward, and forms the boundary between Ontario and Quebec. Below the city of Ottawa it flows eastward and enters the St. Lawrence River opposite the Isle of Montreal. Its length is estimated at 625 miles, of which about 250 miles are navigable. Its navigation is obstructed by rapids and cataracts, but those below the city of Ottawa (St. Anne, Long Sault at Carillon) are overcome by canals. At the city of Ottawa the river presents the impassable Chaudière Falls. The Ottawa is the channel of a very large trade in lumber and is connected with Lake Ontario (at Kingston) by the Rideau Canal. The chief tributaries are the Madawasca, Rideau, Gatineau, and Rivière du Lièvre.

Ottawa, an episcopal city and port of entry of Ontario, capital of the Dominion of Canada and of Carleton co., is beautifully situated on the right bank of the Ottawa River, at its confluence with the Rideau, 101 miles (direct) W. of Montreal, on the Canadian Pacific, the Canada Atlantic and other railroads. It is one of the most flourishing cities of Ontario, being the entrepôt of the great lumber-trade of the Ottawa River, which here forms the splendid Chaudière Falls (200 feet wide and 50 ft. high), and, with its tributary, the Gatineau, supplies the motive-power for the numerous lumber- and flour-mills, factories, etc. The Rideau Canal, which was made in 1827, passes through the city, extending hence through the Rideau Lakes to Kingston, on Lake Ontario. Lumbering is the principal industry of Ottawa and its vicinity, thousands of men, in the winter season, being engaged in cutting timber and drawing it to the streams in readiness for the spring freshets to carry to the Ottawa mills. The cut of timber of the Ottawa sawmills is about 275,000,000 ft. annually. Other industries comprise the manufacture of flour, iron-ware, agricultural implements, machinery, bricks, etc. Ottawa is one of the handsomest cities of the dominion, of which it is also the social and scientific centre. Among its more notable public edifices are the magnificent government buildings, erected in 1859–65 at a cost of over $5,000,000, and crowning Parliament Hill; the cathedral of Notre Dame; Christ Church Cathedral; Rideau Hall, the residence of the governor-general; city-hall, court-house, national art-gallery, fisheries exhibit, and the bureau and museums of the geological survey of the dominion. Ottawa is the seat of Ottawa University (with a library of 30,000 volumes), a normal school, the Collegiate Institute, Lady Stanley Institute, and of various academic institutions. The library of parliament contains upward of 200,000 volumes. A statue to Queen Victoria was erected here in 1901. Lansdowne Park is the site of the Central Canada Annual Exhibition. Lat. of Radcliffe Observatory, 51° 45′ 36″ N.; lon. 1° 15′ 39″ W. It stands on a level site, partly encompassed by low hills, and presents a striking appearance with its numerous stately and architecturally interesting edifices. Oxford, as the seat of Oxford University, is one of the leading educational centres of the world. The town existed as early as the time of the Heptarchy, but the university as a place of distinct collegiate teaching seems not to have come into existence until about the twelfth century. The principal street of the city is High Street (or "The High"), on which are located several of the university colleges. The meeting-place of High Street and three other thoroughfares in the centre of the city is known as Carfax (corrupted from mediæval Latin quadrifurcus,—i.e., "four-forked").

The cathedral of Oxford, attached to Christchurch College, is an edifice of different styles, representing the period between the twelfth and sixteenth centuries. Other churches are St. Mary's, St. Michael's, St. Peter's in the East, the oldest existing church in Oxford, St. Mary Magdalen, a handsome edifice in the Decorated style, All Saints', and St. Giles'. The new Municipal Buildings, erected in 1893–97, are a handsome pile and contain the municipal library.

Oxford has large diocesan and national schools, numerous charitable endowments, the Radcliffe Infirmary, Pusey House (an Anglican clergy-house, founded in 1884), Ruskin Hall (workingman's college), etc.

The University of Oxford consists of 21 colleges and 1 hall (St. Edmund Hall), besides 5 private halls. Their names and dates of foundation are as follows: University College (1249), Baliol (about 1263). Merton (founded at Malden, in Surrey, in 1264, and transferred to Oxford 10 years later), Exeter (1314), Oriel (1326), Queen's (1340), New College (1379), Lincoln (1429), All Souls' (1437), Magdalen (1458), Brasenose (1509), Corpus Christi (1516), Christchurch (1524), Trinity (1554), St. John's (1555), Jesus (1571), Wadham (1613), Pembroke (1624), Worcester (1714), Hertford (1740; resuscitated, 1874), Keble College (1870), and St. Edmund Hall (1226).

Besides the buildings of each individual college and hall, there are others of a splendid description, belonging to all in common, or to the university properly so called. Of these the most remarkable are the Sheldonian Theatre, built by Sir Christopher Wren (1664–69) and so arranged as to accommodate nearly 4000 persons; the buildings called the Schools, used for the examination of candidates for degrees; the Bodleian Library, originally established in 1445 and containing upward of 500,000 printed volumes and 30,000 manuscripts; Ashmolean Museum, Radcliffe Library, University Museum, Indian Museum, Radcliffe Observatory, the Clarendon (University press), and the Taylor Institution and University Galleries, a magnificent range of buildings, partly for the custody of works of art and partly devoted to the purposes of a foundation for the teaching of modern languages. In connection with the university may be mentioned the botanical garden. There are in Oxford, in partial affiliation with the university, four halls for women, —Lady Margaret Hall (founded in 1879), St. Hugh's Hall (1886), Somerville College (1879), and St. Hilda's Hall (1898). Oxford Divinity School dates from the fifteenth century, although theological lectures were delivered as early as 1130, which may be recognized as being approximately the foundation of the university. The University of Oxford, which in 1903 was attended by 3570 students, sends 2 members to parliament, and the borough, as such, 1 member. Pop. in 1901, 49,336. Oxford plays a prominent rôle in the political annals of the Middle Ages. As an intellectual centre it had risen by the year 1300 to the foremost place alongside of Paris. The city was the headquarters of Charles I. in his struggle with parliament.

Pacific Ocean (formerly known as the Great South Sea; often called in Fr. Mer du Sud, mair dü süd; Ger. Südsee, züd′zā\, or Stilles Meer, stil′lęs mair), the largest of the great divisions of water on the surface of the globe, extends from the Arctic to the Antarctic Circle, over 133 degrees of latitude, and from the W. coast of America to Australia and the E. coast of Asia, or through approximately 190 degrees of longitude. Area, estimated at 60,000,000–70,000,000 sq. m. In its widest part, at the equator (which divides it into a North and South Pacific), it is 11,000 miles across. The most distinguishing features of the Pacific are the countless number of comparatively small islands (mainly of coral and volcanic formation) which are spread over its surface, more especially over the equatorial region, and the immense chain of mountains, with numerous active, dormant, and extinct volcanoes, which stretches almost continuously along either shore. In the S. it is separated from the Antarctic Ocean only by an arbitrary line; and many geographers prefer to designate that portion which lies S. of lat. 40° S. (as also in the case of the Atlantic basin) as belonging to a distinctly classed Southern Ocean. On the N. it communicates with the Arctic Ocean through Bering Sea and the shallow Bering Strait, whose narrowest point, separating the continents of North America and Asia, is about 54 miles wide. Its coast-line on the American side, which is generally bold, is very little broken by inlets, the largest of these being the Gulf of California, Puget Sound and its associated waters, and Cook Inlet and Bristol Bay in Alaska. On the Asiatic side it is very irregular; the chief inlets are the China, Yellow, Japan, and Okhotsk seas. Among the more noted island-groups are the Philippines, Japan, the Kurils, Aleutians, Ladrones, Carolines, Solomon, Marshall, New Hebrides, Fiji, Samoa, Tonga, Tahiti (Society), Low (or Tuamotu), Marquesas, Hawaii, Galåpagos, and New Zealand, besides a vast multitude of solitary islands. The islands of the East Indian Archipelago (Borneo, Java, Sumatra, etc.) and the connecting comparatively shallow seas, together with Papua and Australia, separate the Pacific basin from that of the Indian Ocean.

The average depth of the Pacific Ocean is thought to be 12,000–13,000 feet, perhaps not very different from that of the Atlantic. The greatest and most abrupt depths lie on the Asiatic side and in close proximity to island-groups or chains; such are the abysses of Guam (Nero Deep), in lat. 12° 40′ N. and lon. 145°.40′ E., with a depth of 31,614 ft., the greatest known depth of all oceans; of Tonga and Kermadec (in lat. 30° 28′ S., lon. 176° 39′ W., with a depth of 30,920 ft.); of the NE. of New Zealand; and of the Tuscarora Deep, SE. of the Kurils and E. of the main island of Japan, with a depth of 27,925 ft. Zones of great depth also approach closely to the coasts of Peru, Chile, and Mexico. A belt of unusually deep water likewise borders the Aleutian Islands on the S. (24,225 ft. off the island of Attu). The greatest depth of the mid-Pacific is somewhat more than 20,000 ft.

Owing to the vast extent of the Pacific Ocean, the general laws by which tides, winds, and currents are regulated suffer fewer modifications than in narrow seas. The tidal fluctuation is scarcely perceptible among the central islands. In the Low Archipelago, for example, and at Tahiti, the rise is only 1 foot, and at the Hawaiian Islands 2 feet. It is only when by the proximity of a main-land, or by other similar causes, the natural course of the wave is changed or obstacles to its progress are interposed, that high tides are formed. In the Pacific, however, these never attain the maximum heights for which some parts of the Atlantic and Indian oceans are remarkable. Over nearly the whole of the W. coast of America the rise is below 10 ft.

The prevailing winds of the Pacific, like those of other great seas, are divided into regular or trade winds and variables, the former blowing from the SE. on the S. and from the NE. on the N. side of the equator, generally within the tropics, though sometimes extending as far as 30 degrees on either side of the equator. In the W. and NW. parts of the Pacific the influence of the monsoons of the Indian Ocean is strongly felt, and violent typhoons, for which the China Sea is noted, are not unfrequent. In the E., along the whole of the W. coast of America, the winds differ greatly both in direction and character. Between Bering Sea and lat. 30° N. the winds blow, in all seasons, in every direction, and no kind of regularity can be traced. From lat. 30° to 5° N. the prevailing winds strongly resemble monsoons, blowing generally from November to April from the NW. and NE. and from May to October from the S. or SW. and SE. The regions within the sphere of these winds are subject to violent storms and tornadoes. From lat. 5° N. to 30° S. the prevailing winds have the character of trade winds; and from lat. 30° S. to Cape Horn the north and south monsoons recommence, often blowing with great violence, particularly from the S. As the Cape is approached, the prevailing winds become SW. and NW. and convert the whole tract within their sphere into a region of storms.

The currents of the Pacific correspond closely to those of the Atlantic Ocean. A strong Antarctic "drift," which is frequently largely charged with icebergs, sets northward between Australia (or New Zealand) and Patagonia and is deflected on the South American side to form the northwardly trending Humboldt (or Peruvian) Current, which in its turn is deflected westward (between the equator and lat. 20° S.) to form the South Equatorial Current. This moves westward across the entire width of the Pacific basin. A corresponding current in the northern basin is the North Equatorial Current, which forms a somewhat circuitous sweep between lat. 20° and 53° N., giving origin to the warm-water Kuro-siwo (or Japanese) Current, the counterpart of the Atlantic Gulf Stream. An arm of this latter stream forces its way through Bering Strait into the Arctic basin. A cold Bering Sea current carries with it a lowering temperature to more southerly regions. Occupying a narrow zone between the North and South Equatorial currents is the eastwardly trending equatorial counter-current. The average salinity of the Pacific Ocean is seemingly somewhat less than that of the Atlantic. For some of the general features of this ocean (as well as of other oceans) see Atlantic Ocean.

The Pacific was seen by Europeans for the first time from its E. shores in 1513, when Vasco Nuñez de Balboa, the Spanish governor of Darien, crossed the isthmus of Panama and saw the boundless ocean spread out before him. It received its present name from the celebrated navigator Magellan, who sailed across it in 1520–21.

Palat′inate (Ger. Pfalz, pfälts), the name of two small countries in the old German Empire,—the Lower (Rhenish) Palatinate (Unterpfalz, Rheinpfalz) and the Upper Palatinate (Oberpfalz),—which were politically connected down to 1620. The territories which constituted the Lower Pa-latinate (the Palatinate proper) are now included in Bavaria, Baden, Hesse, and Prussia. Only about half of the present government district of the Palatinate (Rhenish Palatinate) in Bavaria belonged to the old Electors Palatine. Their principal domain, the Electoral Palatinate, extended on both banks of the Rhine far beyond the limits of the present Palatinate, and included the towns of Heidelberg (the seat of the Electors Palatine) and Mannheim. The next most important territory of the Lower Palatinate was the duchy of Zweibrücken (Deux-Ponts). The Upper Palatinate forms part of the present government district of the same name in Bavaria. The capital was Amberg. The name Pfalz, from the Latin Palatium (palace), was the designation in early mediæval times of the imperial castles which existed in various parts of Germany. The Counts Palatine (i.e., Counts of the Palace) of the Rhine, whose original seat was at Aix-la-Chapelle, figure as hereditary princes as far back as the eleventh century. They gradually rose to be among the foremost of the German princes. From 1214 the Palatinate was under the rule of the House of Wittelsbach. The Golden Bull of 1356 designated the Count Palatine as one of the seven imperial electors who had the right to choose the head of the Holy Roman Empire. Shortly before this a new domain, which came to be known as the Upper Palatinate, had been added to the hereditary dominions of the Palatinate. In 1386 the Elector Palatine founded the university of Heidelberg. As a result of the events of the first period of the Thirty Years' War the Upper Palatinate passed into the possession of Bavaria (1628). The extinction of the Wittelsbach dynasty in the electorate of Bavaria in 1777 placed the Elector Palatine upon the throne of that country. The Rhenish Palatinate was dismembered in the course of the wars which followed the French Revolution. The two principal cities, Heidelberg and Mannheim, passed to Baden.

Palatinate, or Rhenish Palatinate, formerly also known as Rhenish Bavaria, a region of Germany, constituting a government district in the kingdom of Bavaria, lying between Baden on the E. and Rhenish Prussia on the W. and between Hesse and Rhenish Prussia on the N. and Alsace-Lorraine on the S. Area, 2288 sq. m. Pop. in 1900, 831,678. The Rhine forms the E. boundary. Parallel with the river, about 20 miles to the W., extends the range of the Hardt, a northern prolongation of the Vosges, with elevations slightly exceeding 2000 feet. The Palatinate is a charming region, with its fertile fields and orchards, its vine-clad hills, and its wooded mountains. Its wine is noted. Capital, Speyer; the largest town, Ludwigshafen. The majority of the inhabitants are Protestants. The boundaries of this district do not correspond to those of the old Palatinate.

Palatinate, Upper (Ger. Oberpfalz), a government district in the E. part of Bavaria, bordering on Bohemia. Area, 3728 sq. m. Pop. in 1900, 553,841. It is a mountainous and hilly region. In the E. is the Bohemian forest. In the N. and S. respectively it is traversed by the offshoots of the Fichtelgebirge and the Bavarian Forest. On the W. border is the Franconian Jura. The principal rivers are the Danube, on the S. border, and its affluents, the Altmühl, Laber, Nab, and Regen. Capital, Regensburg (Ratisbon).

Palermo, på-lĕr'mo (Fr. Palerme, pa'lĕrm'; anc. Panor'mus), the capital of Sicily, the military, judicial, and ecclesiastical seat of the island, is situated on its N. side and on the Bay of Palermo. Lat. of observatory, 38° 6′ 44″ N.; lon. 13° 21′ 28″ E. Pop. (commune) in 1901, 309,694. It is built in the form of an amphitheatre, enclosed by the fertile plain of the Conca d'Oro and facing an amphitheatre of mountains, the most imposing feature of which is the Monte Pellegrino, in the N. Adjoining the water is the ruined fort of Castellamare. The city has many notable edifices, including a cathedral of the twelfth century, surmounted by a modern dome, and containing many fine sepulchral monuments in porphyry, among which are those of the Emperor Frederick II. and King Roger the Norman; the magnificent churches of San Salvatore, San Giovanni degli Eremiti, La Martorana, and San Domenico; a royal palace (in the Piazza della Vittoria), in the Norman and Saracenic style, possessing, among other objects of interest, the chapel of King Roger (Cappella Palatina), regarded as perhaps the most beautiful palace-chapel in the world; the archiepiscopal palace, public library, theatres, and national museum (Museo Nazionale), with extensive collections of paintings, sculptures, pottery, etc. The main artery of the city is the Corso Vittorio Emanuele, which terminates at the shallow harbor called La Cala and opposite the Garibaldi garden. The main harbor (or Porto) is protected by long moles. Palermo has numerous educational and scientific institutions, chief of which is the university, founded in 1779 and containing important collections of natural history. The attendance in 1900–01 was about 1400. The city has a fine botanical garden, and among its attractions are numerous ornamental fountains. The trade of Palermo has the advantage of an excellent roadstead and harbor and has been steadily growing. The principal articles of export include sumach, wine and spirits, oranges and lemons, sulphur, skins, oil, liquorice, and manna. The fisheries on the coast are very productive and carried on with great activity, giving employment to several thousand hands. The city occupies a very inferior position industrially. There is some ship-building and there are large iron-foundries. Gloves are among the principal articles manufactured. Founded by the Phœnicians, Panormus became the chief place of the Carthaginian possessions in Sicily. It was taken by the Romans in 254 B.C. When the island was in the hands of the Saracens the seat of government was established at Palermo. The Normans took it in 1072. In 1282 it was the scene of the massacre called "the Sicilian Vespers," when the inhabitants rose against their French oppressors. In 1860 it was captured by Garibaldi.

Palestine, păl'es-tīne (L. Palæsti'na), or the Holy Land, a country of Asiatic Turkey, comprising the SW. part of Syria. It borders on the Mediterranean Sea for a distance of about 150 miles, extending eastward to the Syrian Desert. On the N. it has the region of the Lebanon, a line drawn from the mouth of the Litany (El-Kasimiyeh) through Mount Hermon (about lat. 33° 20′ N.) being approximately the boundary on this side. Southward it extends to Arabia Petræa, the boundary being a short distance to the S. of the southern end of the Dead Sea. The country consists of two parts: Palestine W. of the Jordan and Palestine E. of the Jordan. The former has an area of somewhat more than 6000 sq. m.; the latter has approximately half that extent. Palestine comprises four distinct regions, the Jordan valley, the mountain region to the W. of the Jordan, the plateau to the E. of the Jordan, and the coast-land. The most remarkable feature of the country is the great central depression of the Jordan valley (El-Ghor), apparently formed by a sudden collapse of the earth's crust, which extends like a deep fissure from N. to S. throughout the greater part of the length of the country, and which is continued southward to the Gulf of Akabah under the name of El-Arabah. Its southern part is occupied by the Dead Sea, whose surface is nearly 1300 feet below sea-level and whose bottom descends to about an equal depth. This lake, which is nearly 50 miles long, receives the waters of the Jordan and a few small streams, including the Arnon. Its waters hold in solution about six times as much salt as does sea-water. Where it enters Lake Huleh (the "Waters of Merom"), 85 miles (in a direct line) N. of the Dead Sea, the Jordan is still 7 ft. above sea-level. Only 10 miles farther (in a direct line), where its waters spread out into the Lake of Tiberias (Sea of Galilee, Lake of Gennesaret), it is 680 ft. below the level of the sea. Then in an extremely tortuous course it threads the bottom of the depression, descending another 600 ft. The principal affluents of the Jordan are the Yarmuk and Jabbok, both from the E.

The highlands of Palestine may be regarded as continuations of the Lebanon and Anti-Libanus. To the W. of the Dead Sea and the lower Jordan, forming the water-shed between the Jordan and the Mediterranean, is the mountain-range known in its main portion as the highlands of Judah, extending in a N. and S. direction. For a great part of its length it presents a continuous plateau supporting low mountains. The highest summit, near Hebron, is 3370 feet above the sea. In the N. portion, in Samaria, are Ebal and Gerizim, 3077 ft. and 2849 ft. respectively. Jerusalem is situated near the middle of this mountain-range, which has an abrupt descent towards the E. The slope towards the Dead Sea (which includes the Wilderness of Judah) is rocky, barren, and deeply cleft. The descent towards the W. is gradual. These highlands are continued southward by an elevated plateau. In the NW. they resolve themselves into a region of hills, which dip down into the fertile plain of Esdraelon, elevated only about 250 ft. above the sea, above which rises on the SE. Mount Gilboa and on the NW. Mount Carmel, the latter a promontory-like projection jutting into the Mediterranean. The coast-region to the W. of the hill-country of Samaria is the Plain of Sharon. To the W. of the upper Jordan, separated from the southern highlands by a lateral extension of the Jordan depression and by the plain of Esdraelon, is the mountain-region of Galilee, with peaks ranging from 1500 to 4000 ft. in elevation. Numerous deep river-valleys (wadis) from the E. and W. have been cut into these mountain-ranges. Most of them are generally dry except in their lower reaches. The whole of Palestine E. of the Jordan, including Jaulan (anc. Gaulanitis) and the ancient Gilead, Ammon, and Moab, is a plateau rising in terraces from the depression of the river-valley and the Dead Sea and melting away on the E. into the Syrian Desert. Its highest eminence, in the N., has an elevation of a little more than 4000 ft. Among the peaks on this side of the Jordan are Gilead and Pisgah.

The rock formation of the surface of Palestine is for the most part a chalky limestone. The northern part of the plateau E. of the Jordan exhibits great fields of lava, and here extinct craters are visible. Palestine has been visited by earthquakes in historic times. The coast is very little indented, the only real bay being that of Acre, formed by the projection of Mount Carmel. The only considerable stream emptying into the Mediterranean is the Litany, on the N. border of the country. The Bay of Acre receives the brook Kishon. Much of the soil of Palestine is naturally very fertile when sufficiently watered. The rainfall, however, has largely to be supplemented by artificial irrigation. Large tracts are adapted only to pasturage or remain altogether barren. Much of the country presents a naked appearance. The mean annual rainfall is a little over 20 inches or about half of that of the eastern United States. There are two seasons of rainfall,—a long one extending from October to February and a short one in the early spring. In nearly half a year there is no rainfall. The climate of the highlands, although the heat of summer is great, is on the whole healthful. The heat in the Jordan valley is rendered almost unendurable by the humidity of the atmosphere. Palestine produces a great variety of vegetable products, including wheat, barley, and other grains, beans, lentils, olives, apricots, almonds, figs, and other subtropical fruits, grapes (which yield fine wine), dates, melons, cucumbers, onions, tomatoes, and other vegetables. With careful cultivation the country could support a vastly larger population than is found there. The flora is a rich combination of the floras of the Mediterranean region, of temperate Europe, of the Asiatic deserts and steppes, and of the tropics. The mountains are in places covered with forests, but the higher elevations are generally bare. But few large carnivorous animals are now left in Palestine. Wild goats are numerous. Large numbers of sheep and goats are reared on the pastures. Agriculture, on the whole, is in a very backward state. In recent times German and Jewish agricultural colonies have been established in Palestine with good results. Among the latter, founded mainly by people fleeing from persecution in Russia and Rumania, are Zikron, Ya'akob, Petah, Tikwah, Rishon le-Zion, and Rehoboth, all near the coast, and Metullah and Rosh Pinar, in the interior, in the extreme N. A railway connects Jerusalem with the port of Jaffa and another line connects the upper Jordan valley with the port of Haifa. The Damascus-Mecca railway, in course of construction, is in operation along the eastern borders of Palestine. The population of Palestine is probably not far from 750,000 and consists of Syro-Arabians, Christians, and Jews.

The name Palestine (first applied to the country by the Greeks) is derived from that of the Philistines (Hebrew, Pelishti), the inhabitants of the S. part of the coast-land. The name by which the country was known to its Hebrew possessors is Canaan. Neither Canaan nor Palestine was a political designation. The Hebrews obtained the mastery over the Canaanites, who were closely akin to them in speech and who were ruled by a number of petty kings, about 1200 B.C. Much later, the subjugation of the Philistines was gradually effected. The division of Palestine according to the Hebrew tribes was as follows: Palestine W. of the Jordan comprised Simeon, Judah, Dan, and Benjamin in the S., Ephraim and half of Manasseh in the centre, and Asher, Naphtali, Zebulon, and Issachar in the N. Palestine E. of the Jordan comprised Gad, Reuben, and half of Manasseh. The coast-land to the N. of Philistia was inhabited by the Phœnicians. To the S. of the Hebrews were Edom (Idumæa) and the country of the Amalachites. To the E. of the Dead Sea were the Moabites and Ammonites. On the E. border of northern Palestine was Bashan. Adjoining Palestine on the N. was the Aramæan kingdom of Damascus, which was destroyed by the Assyrians at about the same time as the kingdom of Israel. About the middle of the tenth century B.C. the Hebrew kingdom was rent in twain—Israel in the N., Judah in the S. The kingdom of Israel, whose capital was Samaria, was destroyed by the Assyrians about 722 B.C. The kingdom of Judah suffered the same fate at the hands of the Babylonians, who took and destroyed Jerusalem in 586 B.C. Half a century later Palestine became part of the Persian Empire and the Jews returned from the Babylonish Captivity. Palestine was subjected by Alexander of Macedon in 332 B.C. After the disruption of the empire of Alexander it constituted a possession of Egypt and at the beginning of the second century B.C. was annexed to the kingdom of Syria (kingdom of the Seleucidæ). Under the rule of the successors of Alexander Greek cities sprang up in Palestine. The Jews rose against the Syrian kings under the lead of the Maccabees (Asmoneans) in 167 B.C. and after a struggle of a quarter of a century a hereditary Jewish realm was established in southern Palestine. Its limits were extended by conquest until it embraced nearly all of Palestine, together with Idumæa. The Asmonean realm became the kingdom of Judea. From 63 B.C. Judea was a dependency of Rome. In 37 B.C. Herod the Great put an end to the rule of the Asmoneans and established the Idumæan dynasty, which ruled under the overlordship of Rome. At the beginning of the Christian era the main divisions of Palestine were Judea, Samaria, and Galilee, occupying respectively the southern, central, and northern portions of the region W. of the Jordan, and Peræa, E. of the Jordan. In A.D. 66 the Jews rose against the Roman rule, the war terminating with the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. In A.D. 132–135 occurred the great insurrection under Bar-Cochba, which was followed by the dispersion of the Jews. On the final division of the Roman Empire (A.D. 395) Syria and Palestine formed part of the Byzantine (or Greek) Empire, from which they were wrested by the Saracens in 634–636. In the second half of the eleventh century the Seljuks made themselves masters of these regions. In 1099 the Crusaders established the kingdom of Jerusalem, which was overthrown in 1187 by Saladin, sultan of Egypt and Syria. In 1291 the Christians lost Acre, their last stronghold in the Holy Land. In 1516 the Ottoman Turks established their dominion over Syria and Palestine. The southwestern part of Palestine constitutes the mutessarriflik of Jerusalem. The rest of the country is included in the vilayets of Beirut and Syria.

Palmyra, pål-mi'ra, an island of the Pacific Ocean, in lat. 5° 49' N., about 850 miles S. by W. of the Hawaiian Islands.

Palmyra (a translation of the Semitic Tadmor, "city of palms"), an ancient city in an oasis of the Syrian Desert, 120 miles NE. of Damascus. It was an important centre of commerce when the Romans first extended their operations to this region in the first century B.C. After having occupied the position of a Roman municipium, it became prominent in the third century A.D. as the seat of a principality which, under Queen Zenobia, attained to great power and splendor. It was an ephemeral realm, overthrown by the Roman emperor Aurelian in A.D. 273. The Romans destroyed the city, which was afterwards rebuilt and in the eighth century suffered destruction at the hands of the Saracens. It reappears and is mentioned as having been pillaged by Timur. The ruins, which cover a large area, attest the magnificence of the ancient city. The principal remains are those of the temple of Baal, which had 390 columns. The Palmyrenes spoke an Aramean dialect. Greek culture distinguished the realm of Zenobia.

Pamir, pä-meer', an elevated region of west-central Asia, a continuation of the Tibetan highland, located at a more or less close convergence of the Hindu-Kush, Himalaya (Karakorum), Kuen-Lun, and Tian-Shan mountains. It in the main constitutes the SE. portions of Russian Turkestan and the khanate of Bokhara, and from its generally lofty surface has been designated the "roof of the world." The region, which except along water-courses (or basins) is practically destitute of vegetation, is structurally one of traversing mountain-ridges (with absolute elevations of 16,000–18,000 feet) and high-surface valleys (pamirs), whose levels are mainly constituted by the waste derived from the mountain walls. Most of it drains into the Amu-Darya (Oxus), one of whose main head-waters, the Murghab, rises here, while another, the Panj, issuing from Lake Victoria, forms part of the southern boundary. The Kizil-Su and Zerafshan also carry much of the off-flow into the Amu. The loftiest mountain-summits of the Pamir border are the Mustagh-Ata (Tagharma) on the E., about 24,400 (25,780?) ft.; and Mount Kauffmann, of the Transalai, on the N., 23,000–25,000 ft. The general surface elevation of the Pamir is about 13,000–15,000 ft. It is inhabited by Kirghiz tribes.

Panama, pån'a-må', a republic of America, constituted in Nov., 1903, and coextensive with the former department of the same name of the republic of Colombia, and virtually with the isthmus of Panama. It lies between lat. 7° 15′ and 9° N. and lon. 77° 15′ and 82° 30′ W. It has the Caribbean Sea on the N. and the Pacific Ocean on the S. On the W. it is bounded by Central America (republic of Costa Rica). Extreme length, about 350 miles; width, 120 miles, reduced in its narrowest part to somewhat over 40 miles. Area, about 31,600 sq. m. The region is of a mountainous character, with a line of heights, the Sierra de Panamá, thought at one time to be the true prolongation of the Andes, running axially through it and attaining a maximum elevation probably not exceeding 3000 feet. A low saddle of only about 300 ft. absolute elevation marks the passage of the transisthmian railway and the position of the contemplated traverse of the Panama Canal. In the western half of the isthmus two prominent mountain series (or chains) are recognized,—the Cordillera of Veragua and the Sierra de Chiriquí,—which carry a number of volcanic summits and rise to majestic elevations (volcano of Chiriquí, 11,970 ft.; dome of Santiago, 9275 ft.). The rock formation is largely of a sedimentary character, containing in places marine fossils of as late a period as the Miocene, and there are no recent or dormant volcanoes except in the extreme W. (Chiriquí). A very considerable portion of the region is densely grown with a rank and luxuriant forest, in which much valuable timber (mahogany, etc.) is found. There is a fair amount of good arable and grazing land and many of the more valuable tropical (or warm-temperate) products—such as bananas, cacao, indigo, tobacco, sugar-cane, vanilla, etc.—are under cultivation or grow in abundance. The rivers of Panama are of considerable length, but they are not ordinarily navigable beyond their estuaries, and in times of flood are raging torrents. The best known of these are the Chagres, discharging on the N. coast near Colón, and the Bayano, a tributary of the Pacific Ocean. Little is as yet known of the mineral resources of the country, nothing being done in the way of mining. The climate is markedly tropical, with a dry season covering the months January–April and a wet season for most of the balance of the year. The mean annual temperature is about 80°, with a maximum and a minimum of about 100° and 60°. The hottest months are generally December–March. Rains are much more copious on the Caribbean (Atlantic) than on the Pacific side, and the quantity also greatly exceeds that which falls over the interior. In the town of Panama the average annual precipitation is about 66 inches; at Colón, about 125–130 inches, and at Gamboa, about 92 inches. Fevers are prevalent in certain regions, but the climate generally is not so unhealthy as has been ordinarily assumed. There are practically no roads in the interior. The chief avenue of communication is the interoceanic railway, 49 miles long, which was opened in 1855, uniting Colón with Panama, and along which direct transit is afforded merchandise and passengers shipped on the route of two oceans.—The Panama Canal (a lock-canal), over which the United States is to exercise control, as projected, will have a length between the shore-lines of 44 miles, and between the 6-fathom curves, of 49 miles, 13 of which will be through the artificial Lake Bohio. It is to have a minimum depth of water of 35 ft. The chief engineering works in this construction will be the great dam of Bohio and the Culebra cut, through the high ground of the continental divide, measuring approximately 7 miles in length and having a depth of 250 ft. or more.—The population of Panama is about 230,000, the larger portion of which is constituted by people of Spanish descent. There are a large number of Jamaican and other negroes and a few Chinese. The capital of the republic is Panama. The chief of the administration is a governor. The first European to cross the isthmus was Vasco Nuñez de Balboa, governor of Darien, who in 1513, at the head of a party of which Francisco Pizarro was one, set out on an exploring expedition and from the top of a hill obtained the first view of the Pacific Ocean.

Panama, the capital of the republic of Panama, is situated on the bay of the same name, on the S. coast of the isthmus of Panama. Lat. 8° 57′ 13″ N.; lon. 79° 31′ 58″ W. Its more important part stands on a peninsular tongue of land, across which its streets extend from shore to shore. Pop. about 30,000. It is a bishop's see and has a handsome cathedral, charity and other hospitals, and a normal and several primary schools sustained by government. The city is a free port, with the anchorage for large vessels about 11 miles distant. The harbor is protected by numerous islets and affords secure anchorage. The city has but little trade and, having no system of serviceable drainage, suffers from malarial and yellow fevers. The mean annual temperature is about 82°, with maximum and minimum temperatures of 100° and 60°. The annual rainfall varies from about 45 to 85 inches. Panama is the Pacific terminus of the Panama railway, which connects this place with Colón, on the Atlantic side of the Isthmus. See PANAMA (republic).

The length, from NW. to SE., is about 1500 miles, but the breadth is very unequal. The major indentations of the coast are occupied by Papua Gulf in the SE., the Arafura Sea in the SW., and Geelvink Bay in the NW. The interior is still very imperfectly known, but it is largely mountainous, with possibly a nearly continuous lofty mountain-axis occupying the greater part of the island. Parts of this range or series of ranges are known as the Owen Stanley Range (with Mount Victoria, 13,121 feet), the Albert Mountains, Albert Victor Mountains, and the Sir Arthur Gordon (or Musgrave) Range, all in BRITISH NEW GUINEA (which see). More or less parallel with these are the more northerly Bismarck Mountains of German New Guinea, or KAISER-WILHELMS LAND (which see), with a central summit, perhaps exceeding Mount Victoria in height. Much of the NE. coast is bounded by mountains which rise from 4000 to 10,000 ft. (Gladstone or Kant Mountains). The largest and most important river is the Fly, which empties into Papua Gulf and is navigable for small steamboats for 500 miles. The Kaiserin-Augusta River, in the NE., has been ascended by ocean steamers for 180 miles. The climate is hot and unhealthy in the lowlands, but quite salubrious and agreeable at elevations of 3000–4000 ft. At Port Moresby the extreme range at 9 A.M. has been found to be between 74° and 94°. Ice frequently forms on the loftier elevations, but the mountains are not distinctly snow-capped. The rainfall varies (in different parts) between about 30 and 150 inches. Most of the interior is densely and magnificently forested with banian- and rubber-trees, tree-ferns, evergreen-oaks, and cypresses, and there is a wealth of orchidaceous plants. The fauna is of the Australian type, with the marsupials (tree-kangaroo, wallaby, etc.) and rodents representing the dominant mammalian forms. Among the birds the cassowary, various pigeons and members of the parrot tribe, and particularly the varied species of bird-of-paradise, require special mention. The ophidians are largely of venomous types. The mineral wealth of the land is still but little known, but the indications are that gold and some other precious metals and minerals (osmiridium) are abundantly distributed. Most of the commoner tropical fruits could find here a congenial home. The sugar-cane (said to be indigenous), coffee, vanilla, tobacco, sago, etc., are cultivated. There are practically no roads in the interior, although numerous trails have been cut, more particularly in the English section of the island. The natives, who seem to have been very ancient settlers in the island, are generally classed as Papuan negroes, partially of Malayan blood, whose affinities are with the Polynesians or with the inhabitants of the islands to the E. The mountain Papuans, frequently designated Alfurus, are measurably distinct from the coast-dwellers, many of whom are of a pronouncedly savage disposition. The inhabitants about the river-waters construct pile-dwellings. Politically, Papua is divided into British New Guinea, Kaiser-Wilhelms Land, and Dutch New Guinea (see NEW GUINEA, DUTCH), the last having an area of about one-half of that of the entire island. The total population is estimated at about 750,000.

Papua Gulf, a deep indentation in the S. coast of the island of Papua. It receives the Fly and other rivers.

Papudo (på-poo'do) Bay, an inlet of the Pacific Ocean, in Chile, 45 miles NE. of Valparaiso.

Paqueta, på-kå'tå, an island of Brazil, in the Bay of Rio de Janeiro, about 4 miles long and two-thirds of a mile broad.

Paquette, på'kĕt', or Paquetville, a post-village of Compton co., Quebec, 22 miles E. of Coaticook, on the Maine Central R. Pop. 200.

Par, an ecclesiastical parish of Cornwall, England, 4 miles from Lostwithiel. It has a pilchard fishery, silver-smelting works, etc.

Pará, på-rå', the name originally applied to the river Amazon, but now employed to designate the south arm (or estuary) which receives the Tocantins River. It has a length of about 200 miles, with a breadth varying from 12 to 40 miles. It cuts off the large island of Marajó or Joannes. On its E. side is the city of Pará. It is in this mouth of the Amazon that the bore is chiefly manifested, the tide rising to high water in a few minutes before the new and full moons, by a vast wave, 15 feet in height, followed sometimes by three others, which enter the estuary with irresistible violence.

Pará, or Grão Pará, grŏwn på-rå', a state of Brazil, in the NE., bounded N. by the Guianas and NE. by the Atlantic Ocean. Area, 443,800 sq. m. Pop. in 1890, 328,455 (estimated for 1900, 652,000). The greater part of this region is covered with dense primeval forests. The state is intersected in every direction by the Amazon, Pará, Tocantins, Xingú, and Tapajos rivers and their tributaries, by which interior communication is maintained. Settlement is mainly along the rivers. Grazing is conducted on the open lands. The chief articles of commerce are rice, manioc, millet, cotton, sugar, rubber, cacao, vanilla, sarsaparilla, cloves, balsams, gums, medicinal plants, Brazil-nuts, and hides. Capital, Pará (or Belem).

Pará, or Belem, bå-lĕn', a seaport city of Brazil, capital of the state of Pará, 80 miles from the Atlantic Ocean. Lat. of Fort São Pedro, 1° 28′ S.; lon. 48° 30′ W. Pop. in 1890, 50,064; in 1900, estimated at about 75,000. It stands on elevated ground on the S. shore of the Bay of Guajara, on the right bank of the Pará. It is picturesque and well laid out, and has a botanical garden, museum, library, bishop's palace, seminary, college, theatre, cathedral, etc. It has a fairly good and deep harbor, which has rapidly developed the commercial activities of the city. The cacao, rubber, isinglass, rice, and drugs exported from Brazil are chiefly from Pará, which is the largest rubber port in the world. It has also a trade in cotton, vanilla, annatto, dye-woods, honey, wax, and a great variety of other vegetable, as well as animal, products. The city is connected by rail with Bragança, on the Atlantic coast.

Parabiago, på-rå-be-å'go, a market-town of Italy, in Lombardy, 13 miles WNW. of Milan. Pop. about 4000 (commune, 7000).

Parabuty, pŏh'rŏh'boo'tee, a village of Hungary, co. of Bács-Bodrog, 29 miles W. of Peterwardein.

Paraçatú, på-rå-så-too' (written also Paracatú), a river and city of Brazil, state of Minas Geraes. The river joins the São Francisco near lat. 16° 20′ S., after an E. course of 260 miles. On it, near its head, is the city of Paraçatu, having a Latin school, and abandoned mines of gold and diamonds in its vicinity. It exports sugar and coffee.

Paracels, på-rå-sĕlz', a group of islets and reefs of the China Sea, mostly between lat. 16° and 17° N., 150 miles E. of Annam. They yield edible birds'-nests and turtles.

Paraclet, på'rå'klå', a farm 3½ miles ESE. of Nogent-sur-Seine, in the French department of Aube. Here stood the convent of Paraclet, founded by Abélard in the twelfth century, of which Héloïse was abbess. The tomb of both has been removed to the cemetery of Père-la-Chaise, Paris.

Paraclifta, a post-hamlet of Sevier co., Ark., about 150 miles SW. of Little Rock.

Parád, pŏh'råd', a commune of Hungary, co. of Heves, on the slopes of the Mátra. It is noted for its mineral springs. Pop. about 2000.

Paradas, på-rå'dås, a town of Spain, province and 25 miles ESE. of Seville. Pop. (commune) in 1900, 6639.

Paradise, a post-station of Butte co., Cal.

Paradise, a post-village of Coles co., Ill., 6 miles SSW. of Mattoon. Pop. 75.

Paradise, a post-village of Russell co., Kan.

Paradise, a post-town of Muhlenberg co., Ky., on the Green River, about 42 miles NW. of Bowling Green. Pop. in 1900, 107.

Paradise, a post-village of Clay co., Mo., about 26 miles N. by E. of Kansas City.

Paradise, a post-village in Paradise township, Lancaster co., Pa., on the Pennsylvania R., 60 miles W. of Philadelphia. It has cigar-factories. Pop. of the township in 1900, 2320; of the village, about 500.

Paradise, a township of Monroe co., Pa. Pop. in 1900, 727.

Paradise, a township of York co., Pa. Pop. in 1900, 1214.

Paradise, a post-village of Wise co., Tex., on the Chicago, Rock Island and Gulf R. The banking point is Decatur. Pop. about 375.

Paradise, a post-village of Cache co., Utah, in the fertile Cache Valley, about 70 miles N. by E. of Salt Lake City. Pop. about 500.

Paradise, a post-village of Annapolis co., Nova Scotia, 19 miles ENE. of Annapolis, on the Dominion Atlantic R. Pop. 350.

Paradise Hill, a post-hamlet of Ashland co., Ohio, 4½ miles W. of Ashland.

Paradise Valley, a post-village of Humboldt co., Nev., 42 miles N. of Winnemucca. Pop. 150.

Paradise Valley, a post-village of Monroe co., Pa., on the Lackawanna R., about 38 miles SE. of Scranton. Pop. 200.

Paradiso, a suburb of Lugano, Switzerland.

Paradox, a post-village and resort of Essex co., N.Y., in the Adirondack region, about 22 miles SW. of Port Henry. Pop. 100.

Paradox Lake, N.Y., is in the S. part of Essex co., among the Adirondack Mountains. It is about 4 miles long and 3 miles NE. of Schroon Lake.

Paragau, på-rå-gŏw′, a river of Bolivia, runs N. and joins the Guaporé in lat. 13° 30′ S.

Paragon, a post-town of Morgan co., Ind., near the White River and on the Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis R., 37 miles SW. of Indianapolis. Pop. in 1900, 413.

Paragonah, a post-village of Iron co., Utah, about 6 miles NE. of Parowan. Pop. about 300.

Par'agould, a banking city, capital of Greene co., Ark., on the Paragould Southeastern, the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern, and the St. Louis Southwestern Rs., 21 miles NE. of Jonesboro. It has cotton-gins, roller-mills, and manufactures of staves and heading, hubs, ice, foundry-products, etc. It is a shipping point for lumber. Pop. in 1900, 3324.

Paragua, Philippine Islands. See PALAWAN.

Paragua, på-rå′gwå, a river of Venezuela, tributary to the Caroní, has a N. course of 400 miles. On it is the town of Barceloneta.

Paraguaçu, or Paraguassu, på-rå-gwå-soo′, a river of Brazil, state of Bahia, after a tortuous course of 300 miles, enters Bahia Bay, 35 miles WNW. of São Salvador.

Paraguaná, på-rå-gwå-nå′, a peninsula of Venezuela, state of Falcón, 22 miles NW. of Coro, extending into the Caribbean Sea, in about lat. 12° N., lon. 70° W.

Paraguary, or Paraguari, på-rå-gwå′ree, a town of Paraguay, 35 miles SE. of Asunción, on the Villa Rica railway. It is in a tobacco region.

Paraguay, pår′ą-gwå or på-rå-gwī′, a large river of South America, and one of the principal streams uniting to form the Plata, rises by numerous head-streams in the Brazilian state of Matto Grosso, near the sources of the Guaporé, Tapajos, and Xingú, tributaries of the Amazon, in lat. 14° S., lon. 56° to 58° W. It thence flows S. (partly along the Bolivian frontier), mostly through Paraguay, between which country and the Argentine Republic it forms a portion of the boundary; near Corrientes, lat. 27° 20′ S., it unites with the Paraná, the combined stream being generally known as the Paraná. In the lower part of its course it receives the waters of the Pilcomayo and Vermejo from the W. The chief eastern tributaries are the São Lourenço, Taquary, Mondego, and Tebicuary. Length, about 1500 miles; throughout nearly all of which, to the influx of the Jaurú (lat. 16° 30′ S.), it is navigable. River steamers ascend to the influx of the São Lourenço. Between lat. 17° and 19° S. it traverses a wide region of swamps, which during the rains form a great inland sea (Laguna de los Charayes). Steamboats of the finest class make regular communication between Asunción and Buenos Aires.

Paraguay, a name at one time applied to the whole of the immense region of South America between lat. 16° S. and the Strait of Magellan, and between Chile and Peru on the W. and Brazil on the E., but now confined to one of the smallest of the Spanish-American republics.

Paraguay, an inland republic of South America, the major portion of which, or that known as Paraguay proper (Paraguay Oriental), is included between lat. 22° 4′ and 27° 35′ S. and lon. 54° 32′ and 58° 40′ W. To this is now added that portion of the Gran Chaco, extending N. to lat. 21° 30′ S., which lies E. of the Pilcomayo and was formerly a part of the Argentine Republic. With this broader extent of the republic, the Pilcomayo and Paraguay rivers separate it on the W. from the Argentine Republic, and the Paraná forms part of the boundary on the E. between Paraguay and Brazil and the whole of the boundary on the SE. and S. between Paraguay and the Argentine Republic. On the N. it has Bolivia and the Brazilian state of Matto Grosso. The space thus enclosed forms a compact territory, having an area of about 98,000 sq. m.

A low range of elevations, the Sierra Amambahi, extends N. and S. along the northern part of the Brazilian frontier, dividing southwestward into the sierras of Caa Guazú and Villa Rica and eastward, at about lat. 24° S., into the Sierra de Mbaracayú; the latter takes an easterly course, and its passage across the Paraná forms the famous fall of Guayra (or Sete Quedas). None of these ranges exceeds 1400 feet in elevation. The S. part of the country is low and swampy, eminently fit for rice-culture. (For the characteristics of the Gran Chaco region, see GRAN CHACO.) The streams by which the drainage is effected, though exceedingly numerous, have comparatively short courses. By far the largest is the Tebicuary. The Paraguay River, which forms the western boundary of the republic for about 150 miles below the mouth of the Pilcomayo, rises in Brazil and traverses the rich state of Matto Grosso. From the influx of the Jaurú, in lat. 16°, to the mouth of the Plata, a distance of 19 degrees of latitude, there is not a rapid to impede navigation.

The climate, though for the most part tropical, has its excessive heat greatly modified by the inequalities of the surface. In July and August frosts occasionally occur. The rainfall is moderate, averaging for the region at large 40–50 inches. The whole country is remarkable for its salubrity. The soil is of great fertility and the vegetation almost unrivalled in its luxuriance. In the forests are many kinds of trees furnishing timber, dye-woods, gums, drugs, perfumes, oils, fruits, etc. A principal product is the yerba maté (Ilex Paraguaiensis), or Paraguay tea, an evergreen, the leaf of which is nearly as much used for infusion in South America as the Chinese tea is in the United States. The quantity of the leaf exported in 1903 was 6058 tons, valued at $789,845. The objects of agriculture include the greater part of the most valuable products both of the tropical and temperate zones. On all the alluvial tracts where cultivation is attempted, sugar-cane, cotton, tobacco of superior quality, rice, maize, and culinary vegetables yield a rich return. The large plains feed immense herds of cattle, which are slaughtered chiefly for their tallow, hides, bones, and horns. The fauna of the country is very varied and includes numerous monkeys, the jaguar, puma, tapir, peccary, deer, etc., and a vast assortment of birds of brilliant plumage, the wild turkey, and rhea (or American ostrich).

The trade of Paraguay consists in the export of its tea, fruits, tobacco, sugar, quebracho extract (used in tanning), cotton, rubber, hides, tallow, wax, honey, cattle, horses, mules, wool, leather, etc. In 1903 upward of 105,000,000 oranges were exported; the hides exported during the same year were 271,750 in number. The number of horned cattle in the republic in 1900 was 2,743,665. Its commerce was long greatly retarded by the policy of the government of Buenos Aires (Argentine Republic), which, taking undue advantage of its command of the mouth of the Plata, the outlet to the Paraguay and Paraná, rigorously excluded all intercourse between the countries tributary to these streams and other nations. In 1903 the entries in the port of Asunción were 2671 steamers and 781 sailing vessels. There is a line of railway connecting Asunción with Pirapó, over a length of 156 miles.

Government, Population, History.—The executive power is vested in a president, who is elected for a term of 4 years and exercises his functions with the assistance of a cabinet of 5 ministers. The legislative authority is vested in a congress of two houses, a senate and a house of deputies, chosen by universal suffrage, the election being direct in the case of both. The Roman Catholic Church is the established church, but all religions are tolerated. The capital is Asunción. There are a national college and an agricultural school at the capital. The bulk of the inhabitants are of mixed Spanish and Indian blood (Mestizos). Of the aboriginal tribes the Guaranís, who inhabit the Gran Chaco and many of whom are civilized, are the most numerous. The region of the Paraná and Paraguay rivers was first explored by Sebastian Cabot (in the service of Charles V.) in 1527–28. Spanish colonization soon followed. Asunción was founded about 1536. Early in the seventeenth century begins the remarkable period of Jesuit domination. By exercising gentleness and policy, the Jesuits succeeded in bringing the Indians under the restraints of civilized life. They established a flourishing theocratic commonwealth, whose bounds extended far beyond the limits of the present Paraguay. In 1768 the Jesuits were expelled from Spanish America. In 1776 Paraguay was attached to the vice-royalty of La Plata. The authority of Spain was thrown off in 1811. A war waged against Brazil, the Argentine Republic, and Uruguay in 1865–70 brought ruin upon the republic, which has been slowly recovering from its effects. Pop. in 1900, 635,571, including 100,000 Indians.

Parahyba, or Parahiba, pä-rä-ee'bä (sometimes known as Parahyba do Norte), a river of Brazil, state of Parahyba, to which it gives name, joins the Atlantic by an estuary in lat. 7° 8′ S., after an eastward course of 270 miles. On its S. bank, not far from the estuary, is the city of Parahyba.

Parahyba, or Parahiba, a maritime state of Brazil, intersected by the 7th parallel of S. latitude, having E. the Atlantic Ocean, and inland the states of Rio Grande do Norte, Ceará, and Pernambuco. Area, 28,850 sq. m. Pop. in 1890, 457,232 (estimated for 1900, 596,000). The surface is mostly elevated. The principal rivers are the Parahyba and Mamanguape. The chief products are cotton, coffee, cacao, and sugar, with Brazil-wood, rubber, drugs, and timber, much of which is exported. Cattle of European breeds are numerous. Capital, Parahyba.

Parahyba, or Parahiba, a city of Brazil, capital of the state of Parahyba, on the right bank of the Parahyba, near its mouth in the Atlantic, 65 miles N. by W. of Pernambuco. Pop. about 19,000. It consists of a lower and an upper town. The former is the commercial quarter. In the upper town the streets are wide and well paved, the architecture antiquated. Here are Franciscan and other convents, the principal churches, prison, governor's palace, military arsenal, and treasury. The trade of Parahiba through its port, Cabadello, is chiefly in sugar, cotton, and Brazil-wood. Near the city are some cotton-plantations.

Parahyba (Parahiba) do Sul, pä-rä-ee'bä do sool, or the Southern Parahyba, a river of Brazil, states of São Paulo and Rio de Janeiro, enters the Atlantic, below Campos, in lat. 21° 40′ S., after an ENE. course of 400 miles. Its chief affluents are the Pombal and Muriahé.

Parahyba (Parahiba) do Sul, a town of Brazil, state and 40 miles N. of Rio de Janeiro.

Parahybuna, pä-rä-ee-boo'nä, a town of Brazil. See JUIZ DE FORA.

Paraiso, pä-rä-ee'so, a village of Mexico, in the state of Tabasco, on the Rio Seco, 33 miles N. by W. of San Juan Bautista.

Paraiso, a village of Costa Rica, about 18 miles E. of San José. Pop. 2000.

Paraiso, a station on the Panama railway, republic of Panama, SE. of Emperador.

Paraiso Springs, a post-hamlet of Monterey co., Cal. The banking point is Salinas.

Paraje, pä-rä'hä, a post-village of Socorro co., New Mexico, 11 miles SSW. of San Marcial, its banking point. Pop. about 280.

Paralta, pa-ral'ta, a post-hamlet of Linn co., Iowa, 4 miles E. of Marion.

Paramaribo, par'a-mar'e-bo, the capital of Dutch Guiana, on the W. bank of the Surinam, 16 miles from its mouth in the Atlantic, in lat. 5° 49′ N. Pop. in 1900, 31,817, mostly blacks. It is regularly built and the streets are ornamented with rows of tamarind- and orange-trees. It has Lutheran, Calvinistic, Roman Catholic, and English churches, and Jewish synagogues, and is the centre of the trade of the colony. Fort Zeelandia, N. of the town, is the residence of the governor. It has a hospital for lepers, on the right bank of the Coppename, where patients are maintained at the expense of the colony. It has an extensive trade by sea, exporting sugar, rum, molasses, cacao, and rubber.

Paramé, pä'rä'mä', a town and commune of France, in the department of Ille-et-Vilaine, about 2 miles from Saint-Malo. It is formed of Paramé-les-Bains, Rocheboune, and the village of Paramé, and is a much-frequented sea-bathing resort, with a fine beach, casino, etc. Pop. in 1901, 4911.

Paramithia, a town of Turkey. See PARAMYTHIA.

Páramo de Assuay, pä'rä-mo däs-swī', a pass across the Andes, in Ecuador, between lat. 0° and 2° S. Elevation, 15,500 feet.

Paramythia, or Paramithia, pä-rä-me-tee'ä, a town of European Turkey, in Epirus (Albania), 30 miles SW. of Janina. Pop. about 5000 (?). It is a Greek bishop's see.

Paraná, pä-rä-nä', a large river of South America and one of the principal streams contributing to form the Rio de la Plata, rises by numerous heads in the Brazilian state of Minas Geraes, near the sources of the São Francisco and in some of the head-waters coming from the Serra da Mantiqueira less than 60 miles from the Atlantic Ocean. It flows in a general SW. direction, bounding the republic of Paraguay on the E. and S. and separating it from Brazil and the Argentine Republic. Just before leaving Brazilian territory the river is precipitated over the celebrated fall of Guayra (or Sete Quedas), below which it passes over a long series of rapids. Near Corrientes, in lat. 27° 25′ S., it joins the Paraguay and confers its own name on the united stream. Thence its course is southward to within 50 miles of Buenos Aires, where it unites with the Uruguay River to form the estuary of the Plata. Its total course is variously estimated at from 2100 to 2800 miles. In its upper part it receives numerous large affluents, as the Pardo, Paranahyba, Tiete, Paranapanema, Ivahy, and Iguassú; but, owing to falls, the river is continuously navigable from the Plata only to the island of Apipe, 150 miles above its junction with the Paraguay. Below this point, where the width of the stream expands in some places to 2–3 miles, it is navigable for vessels of 300 tons. Below the junction with the Paraguay it receives one large affluent, the Rio Salado, from the W. In the Argentine Republic, Rosario, Paraná, Santa Fé (on a side arm), Corrientes, Candelaria, and other important towns are on its banks. Vessels drawing 16 feet ascend in high-water to Rosario.

Paraná, a state in the S. of Brazil, extending from the Atlantic Ocean on the E. to the river Paraná, which separates it from Paraguay. Area, 85,450 sq. m. The Brazilian coast-range (Serra do Curitiba) rises about 20 miles inland, separating a strip of low coast-land from an open table-land W. of the mountains, which falls to the Paraná River on the W. boundary. The W. part is covered with forests and is almost unknown, and forest covers the mountains and the coast-strip. The region is bounded S. by the Iguassú (or Rio Grande de Curitiba). Paraná has much fertile land, and cotton, coffee, manioc, and various grains and fruits are cultivated. It collects and exports yerba maté. Capital, Curitiba. Pop. in 1890, 249,491; estimated for 1900, 380,000.

Paraná, formerly Bajada de Santa Fé, bä-hä'-dä dä sän'tä fä, the capital of Entre Rios province, Argentine Republic. It has railway connection with Concepción, on the Uruguay River, and is a stopping-place for all steamers on the Paraná River. Here are colonies of Germans, Swiss, and Italians; it is the centre of a fertile grazing district. Pop. in 1895, 24,261.

Paranaguá, pä-rä-nä-gwä', a maritime town of Brazil, state of Paraná, on a bay of the same name in the Atlantic Ocean, 55 miles E. of Curitiba, with which it is connected by rail. Pop. about 6000. It has a good port for vessels of light draft. Paraguay tea is largely exported.

Paranahyba, or Paranahiba, pä-rä-nä-ee'bä, a river of Brazil, forms part of the boundary between the states of Goyaz and Minas Geraes, and unites with the Paraná on the borders of Matto Grosso. See PARNAHYBA.

Paris (Fr. pron. pä'ree'; anc. Lute'tia, or Lutetia Parisiorum, afterwards Paris'ii), the capital of France and of the department of Seine, the centre of the artistic, scientific, and commercial life of the French nation, and, after London and New York, the most populous city of the world, is situated on both banks of the Seine, just below the confluence of the Marne, about 210 miles in a direct line SSE. of London. Lat. of the Observatoire de Paris, 48° 50′ 11″ N.; lon. 2° 20′ 15″ E. The city, which occupies an area of about 20,000 acres (of which 12,000 are built over), lies generally at an altitude of 120–200 feet above the sea, rising in the heights of Montmartre to 420 feet. The river Seine, which traverses it in a semicircular curve, with its concavity towards the S., has within the city a length of 7 miles and is crossed by 31 substantial bridges, some of them with beautiful structural effects. It forms two islands in the centre of the city, so close to each other as almost to constitute a single island,—the Île de la Cité and the Ile St. Louis, the former representing the most ancient part of Paris. This was the site of the ancient Lutetia, the chief place of the tribe of the Parisii.

In a general way Paris may be divided into three sections: the old city (or central Paris), lying within the line of the main boulevards (Grands Boulevards—Madeleine, Capucines, Italiens, Montmartre, Poissonnière, St. Denis, St. Martin, etc.); the older suburbs (or faubourgs), lying immediately outside of the great boulevards; and the outlying districts, still within the line of fortifications, which have been incorporated with the city since 1860. The principal among these are Auteuil, Bercy, Belleville, Charonne, Ménilmontant, La Chapelle, La Villette, Grenelle, Vaugirard, Les Batignolles, Montmartre, and Passy. The fortifications of Paris, which render the city well-nigh impregnable, consist of an enceinte (no longer encircling the whole city) and of an inner and outer line of forts and fortresses. The forts of the inner line (Ivry, Issy, Montrouge, Valérien, etc.) were in a great measure destroyed in the war of 1870–71, but have since been rebuilt. Paris is divided into 20 arrondissements, each of which is governed by a maire and 2 councillors, the administration of the entire city being under the prefect of the Seine, appointed by the government, and a town council, elected by the citizens.

Paris presents a generally uniform appearance, its buildings, especially those of the new quarters, being constructed in harmonious relation with one another. The avenues or boulevards that circumferentially and radially traverse the city are of great width, superbly maintained, and admirably adapted to relieve the congestion that would be imposed upon minor streets by the great traffic of the city. Those of the inner town contain the finest retail shops and hotels, are lined with restaurants and cafés, and constitute the centre of the fashionable and bohemian life of "out-door Paris." The most famous line of streets is the Rue de Rivoli, with its somewhat irregular continuation in the magnificent Champs Élysées and the Avenue de la Grande Armée on one side, and the Rue St. Antoine on the other, which traverse a great part of the city from SE. to NW. The Champs Élysées, a driveway about 1¼ miles in length, and the Avenue du Bois de Boulogne constitute the most fashionable promenades of the city. Among other prominent streets may be mentioned the Rue de la Paix, Boulevard St. Germain, Avenue de l'Opéra, Rue St. Honoré, Rue du Faubourg St. Honoré, Boulevard Haussmann, Boulevard Sébastopol, Boulevard St. Michel, Rue St. Denis, and the Rue Lafayette. Among the distinctive quarters of the capital are the Quartier St. Germain and Quartier Latin, on the S. side of the Seine, adjoining each other, the former noted as the seat of aristocracy and the abode of ambassadors, and the latter as the home of students and artists. Paris is distinguished for the number of its open squares (places) and gardens, nearly all of which are embellished with monumental sculptures or palaces. Among these are the Palace de la Concorde, one of the finest city squares in the world, measuring nearly 1200 feet in length and 600 ft. in width, with an Egyptian obelisk, brought from Luxor, in its centre; the Place de la Bastille, on the site of the famous prison of the Bastille, torn down by the people in 1789, and containing the Column of July, erected to the memory of those who fell in the revolution of July, 1830; the Place Vendôme, containing the Colonne Vendôme, erected in imitation of Trajan's column at Rome by Napoleon I. to commemorate his victories over the Austrians and Russians in 1805; the Place de l'Étoile, containing the Arc de Triomphe de l'Étoile, the largest triumphal arch in existence, 162 ft. in height and 147 ft. in width, with a passage-way 96 ft. high (begun by Napoleon I. in 1806 and completed by Louis Philippe in 1836); the Place du Carrousel, between the Gardens of the Tuileries and the Louvre, with a beautiful triumphal arch erected by Napoleon I.; the Place de la République, embellished with a statue of the Republic; and the Place de la Nation, Place de l'Hôtel de Ville, Place de l'Opéra, and Place du Trocadéro. In the western part of the city, on the S. bank of the Seine, is the large open space called the Champ de Mars, long famous as a place for military manœuvres and in recent times utilized for international expositions. Here stands the Eiffel Tower, 984 ft. in height, by far the loftiest structure ever erected. The famous gardens in the centre of the city are those lining the Champs Élysées and the Gardens of the Tuileries, on the N. side of the Seine, and the Luxembourg Gardens and the Jardin des Plantes (containing a botanical garden, menagerie, and museum of natural history), on the S. side of the Seine. More removed are the Parc Monceaux in the NW., and the Parc des Buttes Chaumonts in the NE. The two famous parks, the Bois de Boulogne (covering 2250 acres) and the Bois de Vincennes (covering 2275 acres), lie outside of the city limits, respectively in the W. and SE. A section of the Bois de Boulogne has been set off as the Jardin d'Acclimatation, a world-famous establishment for the acclimatization of plants and animals. The quays along the Seine constitute one of the most attractive features of Paris. Among the most famous bridges are the Pont Neuf, Pont de Notre Dame, Pont de la Concorde, Pont d'Austerlitz, Pont d'Iéna, and the new and magnificent Pont Alexandre III.

Paris surpasses all cities of the Continent in its scientific, literary, educational, and benevolent institutions, and in the number of buildings of world renown. Among the latter are the Louvre, the most important public building in the city, a palace of vast extent, dating back to the middle of the sixteenth century and completed in the middle of the nineteenth, which contains the most valuable collections of art N. of the Alps, besides a most important collection of Egyptian and Oriental antiquities; the Palais Royal, N. of the Louvre; the Hôtel de Ville (or city-hall), erected in 1876–84 and replacing its historic predecessor, which was burned in 1871; the Panthéon, a temple dedicated to the memory of illustrious Frenchmen, occupying the site of the tomb of the patron saint of Paris, Ste. Geneviève, and presenting in its lofty dome one of the most striking architectural objects in the city; the Hôtel des Invalides, a vast home for veteran soldiers, under the great dome of whose church is the tomb of Napoleon I.; the Palais de Justice, with the Sainte Chapelle, occupying the site of the ancient palace of the kings of France; the cathedral of Notre Dame, founded in 1163, a noble specimen of early Gothic architecture, whose twin towers soar aloft on the Île de la Cité; the churches of St. Sulpice, La Trinité, and St. Germain l'Auxerrois; the Madeleine (or church of St. Mary Magdalen), in the form of a Greek temple, erected between 1764 and 1842; the national library, whose collection ranks with the library of the British Museum, containing upward of 3,000,000 volumes; the Grand Opéra, a sumptuous edifice covering nearly three acres and erected at a cost of about $7,500,000, but having accommodation for only 2200 persons; the Bourse; the palace of the chamber of deputies; the palace of the Institute of France, comprising the five famous academies known as the French Academy, the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles Lettres, Academy of Sciences, Academy of Fine Arts, and Academy of Moral and Political Sciences; the palace of the Élysée, the residence of the president of the republic; the palace of the Trocadéro, a huge building in Oriental style, built in connection with the World's Exhibition of 1878 and now containing an ethnological museum and collections of sculpture; and the palace and museum of the Luxembourg, the former the seat of the French senate and the latter containing a collection of the works of contemporary artists. The royal (finally imperial) palace of the Tuileries, burnt by the Communists in 1871, is represented only by the wings which formerly connected it with the Louvre. Prominent among the public monuments of old Paris are the Port St. Martin and the Port St. Denis, beautiful triumphal arches erected by Louis XIV.

Among the higher educational institutions of Paris are the University of Paris (including the Sorbonne, for the faculties of literature and science), with about 12,000 students, including nearly 400 women; the Collège de France; Musée d'Histoire Naturelle; Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers (applied sciences); École Normale Supérieure; École des Ponts et Chaussées (for civil engineers); École des Beaux-Arts, founded in 1648, one of the most famous schools of painting, sculpture, engraving, and architecture in the world; the École de Médecine; École Polytechnique; and the Conservatory of Music and Declamation. Among the numerous charitable and benevolent institutions are the hospital of the Salpêtrière, an asylum for aged and insane women, containing 3800 beds, and the Hôtel-Dieu, erected at a cost of $9,000,000, one of the twenty hospitals of the Assistance Publique, which discharges annually about 50,000 men, 40,000 women, and 20,000 children. Among other edifices and institutions, mention should be made of the new palaces of the fine arts, erected in 1897–1900; the Cluny Museum, with a vast collection of mediæval objects of art and industrial products; the observatory; the Gobelins, the state manufactory of the Gobelin tapestry; and the Halles Centrales (or central market), the buildings of which cover 22 acres. The famous theatres besides the Opéra are the Théâtre Français (or Comédie Française), the Opéra Comique, Odéon, and Gymnase.

Paris is supplied with an elaborate system of surface railroads and omnibuses and with an underground electric railway, begun in 1898 and opened for traffic in 1900. Numerous little steamboats ply on the Seine. The city is undermined by a vast network of sewers (cloaques), noted for their great dimensions. The most famous cemeteries are those of Père Lachaise, Montmartre, and Montparnasse. The celebrated Catacombs of Paris, of vast extent, were originally quarries. Some of the railway stations are on a grand scale.

The industrial establishments of Paris embrace all kinds of manufactures, but their products belong especially to the class distinguished as objects of taste and fashion, such as furniture, jewelry, trinkets, bronzes, porcelain, mirrors, clocks and watches, perfumery, bonnets, gloves, dresses, and carriages. The city is celebrated for its mathematical and optical instruments, and it is one of the chief centres in Europe for the production of works connected with the fine arts. The book-publishing business of France is carried on almost exclusively in Paris. The yearly industrial production of the city is valued at about 3½ milliards of francs, being about one-quarter of that of the whole of France.

Among the most noted of the near suburbs of Paris may be mentioned Neuilly, Boulogne, Saint-Cloud, and Saint-Germain-en-Laye in the W.; Sèvres, Meudon, and Versailles in the SW.; Saint-Denis in the N.; Vincennes in the E.; Charenton in the SE.; and Montrouge in the S. Nearly 40 miles to the SE. is Fontainebleau, with its magnificent forest.

Paris was a place of some importance in the time of Cæsar; it was then confined to the island in the Seine now called the Île de la Cité and was the chief town of the Gallic tribe of the Parisii. It rose into prominence under the Roman emperors. Clovis fixed his capital here in 508. From about the close of the tenth century Paris was the permanent capital of France. Philip Augustus (1180–1223) constructed a great wall, the circuit of the fortifications at that time being nearly 4 miles. The establishment of the university, which as an organized institution appears as early as the beginning of the thirteenth century, and which drew thousands of students from all parts of Europe, added greatly to its importance. At the beginning of the fourteenth century the inhabitants appear to have numbered between 150,000 and 200,000. Paris was delivered up to the English in 1420 and held by them for 16 years. The erection of the Louvre and the Tuileries was begun in the sixteenth century. Under Louis XIV. (1643–1715) the city underwent a great transformation, being beautified in many ways, and it now began to assume the position of the social metropolis of Europe. Just before the revolution of 1789 an octroi (customs) wall was built, having a circuit of about 15 miles, which existed down to the time of Napoleon III. The first revolution began July 14, 1789; the second took place in July, 1830; and the third in Feb., 1848. Louis Philippe (1830–48) surrounded Paris with a vast wall and a great ring of forts. Under Napoleon III. the city was greatly modernized and embellished. Since the establishment of the republic a system of improvements has been inaugurated scarcely inferior to those of the second empire. Among the chief military events in the history of Paris in modern times are the siege by Henry IV., who took the city in 1594, the entry of the Allies in 1814 and 1815, the siege and capture of the city by the Germans in 1870–71, and the war of the Commune in 1871, when the city was besieged by the forces of the national government and taken after the destruction by the Communists of the Tuileries and other edifices. Memorable treaties of peace were concluded at Paris in 1763 (closing the Seven Years' War), 1783 (War of the American Revolution), 1814 and 1815 (Napoleonic wars), 1856 (Crimean War), and 1898 (Spanish-American War). The population of Paris in 1718 was 509,000; in 1851 it was 1,053,000; in 1881, 2,269,023; in 1891, 2,447,957; in 1901, 2,714,068. The population is more dense than that of any other large city of Europe. The closely appressed and built-up suburbs, if added to the city proper, would raise the population to above 3,000,000. The mean annual temperature is 51.3°; mean temperature of winter, 37.8°; of summer, 64.5°. Mean annual rainfall, 25 inches.

Parma, DUCHY OF, one of the states into which Italy was divided previous to 1860. It dated from 1545. Associated with the duchy of Parma from the beginning was the duchy of Piacenza, the two forming one state, later known simply as Parma. The House of Farnese ruled down to 1731. Then Parma and Piacenza passed to Don Carlos, son of Philip V. of Spain (House of Bourbon), by whom they were ceded to Austria in 1735. In 1748 Austria made them over, together with the duchy of Guastalla, to Don Philip, brother of Don Carlos. In 1802 Bonaparte took possession of them. The Congress of Vienna (1814–15) created the ex-empress, Maria Louisa, duchess of Parma. On her death, in 1847, the duchy reverted to the former Spanish (Bourbon) dynasty. In 1860 Parma was annexed to the dominions of Victor Emmanuel. The state had an area of about 2750 sq. m. and the population in 1860 slightly exceeded 500,000. Its territories constitute the present provinces of Parma and Piacenza.

Patagonia, Sp. pron. på-tä-go'ne-å, an extensive region comprising the S. extremity of South America, from about lat. 39° S. to the Strait of Magellan. Its possession was long in dispute between the Argentine Republic and Chile, but by treaty of 1881 the latter recognized the right of the former to the country east of the crest of the eastern ridge of the Andes (or the water-parting between the Atlantic and Pacific systems), comprising most of old Patagonia and including the eastern coast of Tierra del Fuego. The W. coast is greatly indented and bordered by the Andes, which here rise generally to between 3000 and 6000 feet, presenting in part forested slopes and a much glaciated region. The surface E. of the Andes is largely in the form of an elevated plateau, capped in great part by sheets of basalt, and falling in terraces to the sea. It extends over several hundred miles, and is composed mainly of Cretaceous, Tertiary, and Post-Tertiary sandstones, with marine shells, clay, earth, and gravel, grass- and bush-grown in part, but elsewhere arid and sterile. There are numerous lakes, many of which appear to be of glacial origin. The chief streams are the Colorado, Rio Negro, Chubut, Santa Cruz, Chico, and Gallegos, most of which are interrupted by rapids. The climate is mostly exceedingly raw, and violent winds prevail. Guanacos, vizcachas (found in great numbers), pumas, foxes, and skunks are the principal quadrupeds. The condor, hawk, vulture, and American ostrich are among the more distinctive birds. The region has yielded an exceedingly rich Tertiary and Post-Tertiary mammalian fauna, with marked Australian and African affinities. The Indians who are thinly scattered over this region are remarkable for their lofty stature; they lead a wandering life, and subsist principally on the flesh of wild quadrupeds, mushrooms, and fish. Patagonia was discovered by Magellan in 1520. He is said to have given the name Patagones to the inhabitants from the circumstance that their feet, encased in the skins of animals, appeared like paws (Port. patas).

Pegu, pe-goo' (called Bagu, bå-goo', by the natives), a town of Burma, in Pegu, on the Pegu River, a tributary of an eastern arm of the Irawadi, 58 miles NE. of Rangoon. Lat. 17° 40′ N.; lon. 96° 20′ E. It is said to have had in the sixteenth century about 150,000 inhabitants, but it has been reduced to comparative insignificance. The population at present is barely above 10,000. A relic of its former grandeur is a splendid temple of Buddha consisting of an eight-sided pagoda. The city was formerly the capital of the powerful kingdom of Pegu, which for about two centuries down to the middle of the eighteenth century, embraced Burma. After having been subject to Burma for a hundred years, the city and country of Pegu passed to England in 1852.

Pei-ho, på'hō' ("white river"), called also the North River, in China, rises near the Great Wall, on the slopes of the Mongolian mountains, flows SE., passing E. of Pe-king, 70 miles S. of which it receives several large tributaries, and enters the Gulf of Pe-chi-li, after passing Tien-tsin, at Taku, in lat. 38° 33′ N. It is navigable for boats for about 100 miles out of a total course of 350 miles. The drainage basin is estimated at 56,000 sq. m. It is connected by the Grand or Imperial Canal with the Hoang-ho and Yang-tse-kiang.

Pe'king', or Pe'kin' (i.e., "the northern capital"), the capital of China, in the province of Chi-li, situated in a sandy plain, between the Pei-ho and its affluent the Hun-ho, 100 miles NW. of the mouth of the former river in the Yellow Sea, at the head of the Grand Canal, and 50 miles S. of the Great Wall of China. Lat. of imperial observatory, 39° 54′ 13″ N.; lon. 116° 28′ 54″ E. The city is connected by railway with Tien-tsin (80 miles) and with Mukden, and thus has rail communication with Europe through the Transsiberian line. The population has been estimated at 1,500,000–2,000,000, but seemingly it does not much exceed 500,000. Peking consists of two contiguous cities, each separately encircled by lofty walls, which together are entered by 16 gates. The entire circuit is reckoned at 25 miles. The walls of the Manchu city, which contains the imperial and forbidden sacred quarters, are 42 feet high; those of the Chinese city are 30 ft. high and 25 ft. thick at the base, diminishing to 12 ft. at the top. There are square towers at intervals of about 60 yards, and the whole is surrounded by a ditch. The streets run mainly at right angles to one another, N. and S., E. and W., and at their intersections there are frequently large arches. The southern or Chinese city is the seat of commerce and the residence of probably the majority of the population, abounding in shops of all descriptions and continually filled with a motley crowd. There are few edifices in this quarter deserving notice. The houses are of brick, with red-tiled roofs, and the city is unpaved and undrained. The northern, Tartar, Manchu, or imperial city consists of three separate enclosures. The outer of these, formerly appropriated to the Tartar garrison, is now mostly occupied by Chinese traders. The second enclosure (Hwang-ching, "the august city" or "imperial city" proper) is entered by 4 large and several smaller gates. In it are extensive public granaries, a military arsenal and seminary, an astronomical and a magnetic observatory (from which the instruments were in greater part removed to Germany in 1900), the great temples of Ancestors and of Peace, the imperial university of China, the residences of the great dignitaries of the empire, the vast examination halls, the halls of the classicists, imperial bridge, bell-tower, the temple of the white pagoda, and a large lake. The inner enclosure (or "forbidden city"), surrounded by a moat faced with masonry, is appropriated to the public and private palaces of the emperor and empress, and has pavilions, gardens, and an artificial mountain. Outside of both cities are open suburbs, bustling with mercantile activity. Peking has edifices appropriated to many forms of religion. Among these are a Greek church and convent, Roman Catholic chapel, Mohammedan mosques, Buddhist temples, and temples dedicated to Confucius and other deified mortals. The imperial university (formerly the national college, Han-lin-yuen) is the great seat of Chinese learning and literature. Among the other learned and scientific institutions of note are the medical college and the astronomical board. Peking has a mint since 1896. Electrical works were introduced in 1900. Among the more recent structures is the Ketteler memorial arch, dedicated in Jan., 1903. About 10 miles WNW. of the city are the remains of a vast imperial park, containing numerous palaces of the emperor and great officers of the state, many of which were demolished by the allies in 1860. Peking has a large printing and bookselling trade and manufactories of colored glass, idols, and other articles. The Pei-ho is navigable for boats to within a short distance of Peking, and communicates with the Grand Canal, by which most of the provisions for the supply of the city are conveyed. Peking is regarded by the Chinese as one of their most ancient cities, but it was not made the capital of the country until its conquest by the Mongols in the latter part of the thirteenth century. It was occupied by the British and French in 1860. Following upon the Boxer movement of 1900 and the siege of the foreign legations, the city was entered by the troops of the allied nations of Europe and America in August of the same year, and held by them until the treaty of Peking in Sept., 1901.

Pennsylvania, one of the North Atlantic States of the American Union, is bounded N. by Lake Erie and New York, E. by New York and New Jersey, S. by Delaware, Maryland, and West Virginia, and W. by West Virginia and Ohio. Its northern line follows the parallel of 42° N. lat., except in the extreme W. (where it borders on Lake Erie), while the southern boundary is constituted almost entirely by "Mason and Dixon's Line," lat. 39° 43′ N. The Delaware River forms the eastern boundary for its full length. Pennsylvania is called the Keystone State, because it was the seventh or central one in order of the original thirteen states. Area of the land-surface, 44,985 sq. m.; of the appertaining waters, 230 sq. m. Maximum length, E. and W., 305 miles; breadth, 158 miles.

The face of the country is exceedingly varied. A most conspicuous feature is presented by the parallel ranges of mountains belonging to the Appalachian system and having a quite uniform direction from NE. to SW. The principal ridges or chains of this system, beginning on the eastern side, are the Blue Ridge (or South Mountain), conforming tectonically to the Highlands of the Hudson, the Blue (North, or Kittatinny) Mountain, which extends from the Delaware Water Gap to the Maryland boundary a few miles S. of Mercersburg; and the various ridges lying westward, which constitute the main mass of the Alleghanies and represent the identical orographic feature of the states lying to the south. The inner ridges in the W., N., and NE. develop into a nearly flat-topped plateau-surface, the "Alleghany Plateau," which in places breaks off in a bold escarpment towards the east and continues northward into the plateau of south-central New York. The most prominent individualized feature of this plateau (which, with a general elevation of 1000–2000 feet, occupies the major part of the western section of the state) is the Pocono Mountain, in the NE. section of the state, which represents in part the eroded plateau of the Catskill Mountains. The Blue (or Kittatinny) Mountain, which in a number of marked depressions or gaps permits of the passage through it of the Delaware, Lehigh, Schuylkill, Swatara, and Susquehanna rivers, is the correspondent of the Shawangunk Mountains of New York, and attains elevations perhaps nowhere much exceeding 2400 ft. Prominent summits are mounts Minsi (about 1500 ft.) and Tammany, the latter in New Jersey, which guard the passage of the Delaware River through the picturesque Delaware Water Gap. The names of subordinate mountain-groups or sections are: Mauch Chunk, Sharp, Locust, Buck, Mahanoy, Shamokin, Catawissa, Bear, Beaver Meadow, Nescopeck, Tuscarora, and the more westerly Sideling, Broad Top, Bald Eagle, Brush, Dunning's, Main Alleghany, Laurel (the most westerly of the prominent ridges), and Savage mountains. The Shawnee, Shickshinny, and Wyoming mountains enclose the Lackawanna coal-field. Most of the ranges between the Sharp and the Wyoming mountains lie in or traverse the anthracite region NNW. of Philadelphia. In the Alleghany Mountains we encounter a complex succession of remarkably uniform, low, narrow, and level-topped, chiefly sandstone, mountains or ridges, separated by narrow valleys, floored with limestone and shales, and crossing the whole state. While the loftiest summit has perhaps not yet been determined, it appears that no elevation much exceeds 3000 ft., and it is doubtful if even this altitude is anywhere attained. There is no marked dominating mountain-peak. A large portion of the state is still forest-land, but the exceedingly fertile valleys, such as the Cumberland Valley (between the South and North mountains), Lebanon Valley, Wyoming Valley, and the valleys of the Susquehanna and Monongahela, have placed Pennsylvania among the leading agricultural states of the Union. The southeastern triangle of the state, which is traversed by outliers of the Appalachian Mountains, forming the North and South Valley Hills, the heights of Chestnut Hill, Bryn Mawr, etc., is largely an agricultural region, and contains the fertile Chester, Montgomery, and Lancaster valleys.

Rivers, etc.—The principal rivers are the Delaware (navigable for large ships to Philadelphia and for smaller steamcraft to Trenton, N.J.; chief tributaries, the Lehigh and Schuylkill, both affording slack-water navigation); the Susquehanna (formed by the union of the East (or North) and West Branches), which is adapted to the floating of rafts and arks, and whose banks have been canalized; the Juniata, the main tributary of the Susquehanna; the Ohio, whose constituent streams are the Alleghany and Monongahela; and the Lackawanna, Conemaugh, and Youghiogheny, tributary streams of secondary importance. The Ohio and its main head-streams afford a great deal of navigation during good stages of water. There are no large lakes in the state, and nearly all the bodies of water entitled to this name are glacial tarns and occur in the region of past glaciation. In this section, in the NE. part of the state, are found a number of highly picturesque waterfalls (Bushkill, Dingman's, Raymondskill, Sawkill).

Geology and Minerals.—With the exception of restricted areas in the SE., where a belt of Triassic shales and sandstones extends from NE. to SW. and where in close proximity to the Delaware River there would also appear to be deposits of Cretaceous and Tertiary age, the entire state belongs basally to the Archæan and Paleozoic periods of geological time, the rocks of oldest age (apart from the very ancient South Mountain) lying almost at the extreme SE. (Delaware, Philadelphia, and Bucks cos.). The immediately succeeding valleys are chiefly Silurian. Beyond this all the formations to the Permian are met with. In mineral wealth Pennsylvania stands in the very first rank among the states, a rank which she occupies chiefly by reason of the abundance, accessibility, and practical usefulness of her stores of coal, iron, petroleum, and natural gas. The production of coal about equals that mined by all the other states of the Union collectively. The output of anthracite in 1903 was 74,607,068 short tons, valued at $152,036,448; of bituminous coal, 103,117,178 tons, valued at $121,752,759. The quantity of iron-ore mined in 1901 was 1,040,684 long tons (largely from the Cornwall-Lebanon magnetite region); but in 1903 the product was only 644,599 tons. In the yield of iron-ore Pennsylvania has been far outstripped by Minnesota, Michigan, and Alabama, and the iron-furnaces in the state now obtain most of their ore from the Lake Superior mines. The production of crude petroleum in 1903 was 11,355,156 barrels, valued at $18,170,881. There has been a marked decrease in production for many years. Other mined or quarried mineral products are serpentine, white marble, slate, chromic iron, nickel, zinc-ore, galena, and corundum. The anthracite is found in long, narrow basins, disposed mainly in three fields,—the Schuylkill and Mine Hill field; the Shamokin, Mahanoy, and Lehigh basins; and the Lackawanna and Wyoming coal-field. Beyond what is sometimes known as the Main Alleghany ridge are found the great bituminous coal-fields, which cover a very large part of the state. Coal does not occur in the southeastern counties. Most of the petroleum of the state has its source in, or is obtained from, strata of Devonian age, the counties of Venango, Butler, McKean, Washington, and Clarion furnishing the greater part of the obtained supply. An important associated product is natural gas, which is obtained chiefly in Greene, Washington, Armstrong, and Clarion cos. The value of the product in 1903 was $14,352,183—nearly half that of the entire product of the United States. Salt is produced extensively by evaporation from strong brines reached by artesian borings. The northern sections of the state are covered with glacial drift. Pennsylvania has a number of noted mineral springs, among which are those of Bedford, York, Doubling Gap, Ephrata, and Yellow Springs.

Climate.—Pennsylvania enjoys the general climate of the middle temperate regions, has a fairly abundant rainfall, and a temperature ordinarily exhibiting no particularly accentuated extremes of heat or cold. The mean temperature of January at Philadelphia is somewhat over 32°, and that of July 76°, with extremes in summer (rare) of 105° and in winter of —6° (or —10°). A much more rigorous cold prevails in the mountain sections where —20° (or even more) is not rare. The average annual rainfall is for the entire state about 44 inches.

Agriculture, Forest Products.—Pennsylvania occupies a very prominent position as an agricultural state, and there is comparatively little land which might not be utilized. The Cumberland, Wyoming, and Lebanon valleys, the beautiful grain-producing and wool-growing counties of the SW., the admirable pastoral soils of the NW., the skilfully managed farms of Lancaster, Chester, Delaware, Montgomery, Bucks, Berks, Lehigh, and Northampton counties, and the limestone soils of most of the mountain-valleys, more than compensate for the acreage of waste lands. Pennsylvania excels in dairy and market-garden products, in wheat, Indian corn, oats, wool, tobacco, fruit, potatoes, hay, live-stock, and indeed in all the agricultural staples of the northern states. In 1900 the production of corn was 32,707,900 bushels, valued at $14,718,555; wheat, 20,281,334 bushels, valued at $14,602,560; oats, 38,000,872 bushels, valued at $11,400,262; rye, 4,416,299 bushels; buckwheat, 3,188,402 bushels; potatoes, 10,921,748 bushels, valued at $5,788,526; and hay, 2,672,561 tons, valued at $37,148,598. The state is a large producer of orchard fruits, and tobacco is a leading crop in York and Lancaster valleys. Pennsylvania ranks as one of the leading states in the lumber-trade and furnishes large quantities of white pine, spruce, and hemlock. In the NE. there are extensive beech forests. Oak of many species, the sugar and other maples, ash, hickory, elm, tulip-tree, black and white walnut, and many other useful trees abound.

Manufactures, etc.—In this department of industry the state holds the second place in the Union, being surpassed by New York alone in the annual value of its products. The iron- and steel-industries, whose principal seats of activity are centred at Pittsburg, Allegheny, Homestead, McKeesport, Johnstown, Harrisburg, Reading, Scranton, etc., outrank those of any other state. In foundry and machine-shop products Pennsylvania takes first position, as it likewise does in textile manufactures and the manufacture of carpets. Pittsburg is also one of the principal glass-making towns in the United States and turns out immense quantities of machinery, castings, nails, hardware, etc. Philadelphia as one of the world's great manufacturing centres has a great variety of industries. Its vast ship-building yards and locomotive works give it a unique position among the industrial centres of the western world. Chester is also an important seat of the ship-building industry.

The values of some of the leading industries of the state in 1900 were: iron and steel, $434,445,200; products of rolling-mills and steel-works, $332,588,174; textiles, $158,782,087; foundry and machine-shop products, $127,292,440; blast-furnace products, $101,575,487; leather, $55,615,009; cars (with repairs, etc.), $62,326,081; flour- and other grist-mill products, $36,639,423; liquors, $34,520,358; petroleum refining, $34,977,706; sugar and molasses refining, $36,163,817; clothing, $35,083,623; tobacco, $33,355,932; glass, $22,011,130; lumber and timber products, $35,749,965; saw- and planing-mill products, $16,736,839; boots and shoes, $13,235,933; paper and pulp, $12,267,900.

The Delaware River affords a channel of commerce deep enough for ships of the largest class, and Philadelphia, on that river, is one of the principal seats in the United States of foreign and coastwise trade. Philadelphia, Erie, and Pittsburg are ports of entry.

Railroads.—The "Switchback" railway at Mauch Chunk, opened in 1826, was followed by a number of other coal roads; and in 1834 the Philadelphia and Columbia R. (82 miles) and the Portage R. (36 miles) were opened, having been built at the expense of the state. In 1835 there were 265 miles of railroad in the state; in 1846, 840 miles; in 1850, 1240 miles; in 1860, 2598 miles; in 1870, 4656 miles; in 1880, 6243 miles; in 1890, 8700 miles; and in 1900, 10,400 miles.

The canals of Pennsylvania, which formerly extended over more than 1000 miles, have been in greater part abandoned, in consequence of the introduction of railroads.

Education.—Although Penn's frame of government directed the establishment of public schools, and the free education of the children of the poor was subsequently provided for by statute, the public-school system of Philadelphia did not come into operation until 1818, and the first common-school law for the state was enacted in 1834. The leading educational institutions of the state are the University of Pennsylvania, at Philadelphia; Western University of Pennsylvania, at Allegheny; Lafayette College, at Easton; Lehigh University, at South Bethlehem; Dickinson College, at Carlisle; Bucknell University, at Lewisburg; Haverford College, at Haverford; Swarthmore College, at Swarthmore; Bryn Mawr College (for women), at Bryn Mawr; La Salle College, at Philadelphia; Theological Seminary of St. Charles Borromeo, at Overbrook; Washington and Jefferson College, at Washington; Franklin and Marshall College, at Lancaster; Lincoln University (for colored), at Lincoln University. There are in addition many professional and technical schools of high grade, and numerous normal and high schools and colleges.

Counties.—Pennsylvania has 67 counties: Adams, Allegheny, Armstrong, Beaver, Bedford, Berks, Blair, Bradford, Bucks, Butler, Cambria, Cameron, Carbon, Center, Chester, Clarion, Clearfield, Clinton, Columbia, Crawford, Cumberland, Dauphin, Delaware, Elk, Erie, Fayette, Forest, Franklin, Fulton, Greene, Huntingdon, Indiana, Jefferson, Juniata, Lackawanna, Lancaster, Lawrence, Lebanon, Lehigh, Luzerne, Lycoming, McKean, Mercer, Mifflin, Monroe, Montgomery, Montour, Northampton, Northumberland, Perry, Philadelphia, Pike, Potter, Schuylkill, Snyder, Somerset, Sullivan, Susquehanna, Tioga, Union, Venango, Warren, Washington, Wayne, Westmoreland, Wyoming, and York.

The principal cities and boroughs are Philadelphia, the largest city in the state and the third in the Union (pop. in 1900, 1,293,697), Pittsburg (321,616), Allegheny, adjoining Pittsburg (129,896), Scranton (102,026), Reading (78,961), Erie (52,733), Wilkesbarre (51,721), Harrisburg, the capital (50,167), Lancaster (41,459), Altoona (38,973), Johnstown (35,936), Allentown (35,416), McKeesport (34,227), Chester (33,988), York (33,708), Williamsport (28,757), etc.

Government, etc.—The present constitution was adopted in 1873. The governor is chosen for a term of 4 years. The general assembly consists of a senate, limited to 50 members, chosen for 4 years, and a house of representatives, chosen for 2 years. The state sends 32 representatives to the lower house of the national Congress.

Population.—In 1790, 434,373; in 1800, 602,365; in 1810, 810,091; in 1820, 1,047,507; in 1830, 1,348,233; in 1840, 1,724,033; in 1850, 2,311,786; in 1860, 2,906,215; in 1870, 3,521,951; in 1880, 4,282,891; in 1890, 5,258,014; in 1900, 6,302,115. The number of foreign-born in 1900 was 985,250; of negroes, 156,845. The southeastern and central sections were to a considerable extent peopled by Germans of the Palatinate, whose language, now much modified, is still heard and is known as "Pennsylvania Dutch."

History.—Pennsylvania was colonized by the Quakers under William Penn, who obtained his patent as proprietor in 1681. His deputy arrived in that year with some settlers and found at Wicaco, within the present limits of Philadelphia, a prosperous Swedish settlement. The city of Philadelphia was laid out in 1682, and in the same year Penn himself came to the colony and concluded a treaty with the Indians. The growth of the colony was rapid from the start, the Quaker settlers being reinforced by Germans. Delaware (the "Lower Counties") formed part of Penn's colony and remained united with Pennsylvania down to the Revolution, having, however, its own legislature after 1703. The Maryland line ("Mason and Dixon's line") was established in 1763–67, and thus closed one intercolonial contest. Connecticut asserted a claim to a part of northern Pennsylvania, and it was only after the massacre in the Wyoming Valley (1778) that the contention regarding this region was brought to a close. In 1774 the first Continental Congress met in Philadelphia. The Proprietary government came to an end in 1776, immediately after the Declaration of Independence, and a state government was organized. Pennsylvania was the scene of many important events during the Revolution. It was in Philadelphia that the Declaration of Independence was signed. In 1794 occurred the "whiskey rebellion," which was suppressed without bloodshed. The battle of Gettysburg, the turning point in the Civil War, was fought in this state in 1863.

Perry, a post-station of Lawrence co., S.Dak.

Perry, a post-village of Falls co., Tex., on the Houston and Texas Central R. The banking point is Marlin or Waco. Pop. 215.

Perry, a post-hamlet of Dane co., Wis., in Perry township (town), about 28 miles SW. of Madison. Pop. of the town in 1900, 1050.

Perry-Bar, a town of England, co. of Stafford, 3½ miles NW. of Birmingham. Pop. in 1901, 2348.

Perry Center, a post-village of Wyoming co., N.Y., 7 miles E. of Warsaw. Pop. 250.

Perry City, a post-hamlet of Schuyler co., N.Y., 11 miles WNW. of Ithaca.

Perrydale, a post-village of Polk co., Oregon, about 15 miles NW. of Salem. Pop. 75.

Perryhall, a post-station of Baltimore co., Md.

Perry Landing, a post-station of Brazoria co., Tex., on the Brazos River, 10 miles below Brazoria.

Perryman, a post-village of Harford co., Md., on the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington R., 27 miles ENE. of Baltimore. Pop. about 275.

Perryopolis, a banking post-village of Fayette co., Pa., on the Youghiogheny River and on the Washington Run R., 40 miles S. by E. of Pittsburg. It has coal- and coke-industries. Pop. about 300.

Perrypark, a post-village of Douglas co., Colo. The banking point is Denver. Pop. 100.

Perrysburg, a post-village of Miami co., Ind., 15 miles NE. of Logansport. Pop. about 700.

Perrysburg, a post-village in Perrysburg township (town), Cattaraugus co., N.Y., on the Erie R., 19 miles E. of Dunkirk. Pop. about 300; of the town in 1900, 1216.

Perrysburg, a banking post-village of Wood co., Ohio, on the right or SE. bank of the Maumee River, at the head of navigation, and on the Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton R., about 9 miles SW. of Toledo. It has extensive water-power and manufactures of wooden-ware, boxes, tiles, etc. Large quantities of ship-timber and staves are exported. Pop. in 1900, 1766.

Perrys Mills, a post-village of Tatnall co., Ga. The banking point is Reidsville. Pop. about 300.

Perrys Mills, a post-village of Clinton co., N.Y., on the Chazy River, 7½ miles W. of Rouse Point. Pop. 150.

Perrysmith, a village of Saline co., Ariz. The banking point is Benton. It has bauxite interests and reduction-works.

Perrysprings, a post-hamlet of Pike co., Ill., on the Wabash R., 4½ miles NW. of Meredosia.

Perrysville, a banking post-village of Vermilion co., Ind., on the W. bank of the Wabash River and on the Chicago and Eastern Illinois R., 44 miles N. of Terre Haute. Pop. about 650.

Perrysville, or Perryville, a banking post-village of Ashland co., Ohio, on the Black Fork of the Mohican River and on the Pennsylvania Co.'s R., 14 miles SE. of Mansfield. Pop. in 1900, 513.

Perrysville, a post-village of Allegheny co., Pa., 7 miles NW. of Pittsburg. Pop. 100.

Perrysville, a post-village of Washington co., R.I., about 18 miles SW. of Newport. Pop. 100.

Perryton, a post-village of Licking co., Ohio. The banking point is Newark. Pop. 150.

Perrytown, a post-village of Durham co., Ontario, on the Grand Trunk R., 9 miles N. of Port Hope. Pop. 100.

Perryville, a post-village of Perry co., Ala., about 20 miles NNW. of Selma. Pop. 100.

Perryville, a post-town, capital of Perry co., Ark., on the Fourche La Fave River, about 40 miles WNW. of Little Rock. It has lumber interests. Pop. in 1900, 300.

Perryville, a banking post-town of Boyle co., Ky., 40 miles SW. of Lexington. Pop. in 1900, 431. On Oct. 8, 1862, a battle was fought here between a part of General Buell's army (Union) and the forces of General Bragg.

Perryville, a post-town of Cecil co., Md., on the Susquehanna River, at its mouth, and on the Pennsylvania and the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Rs., 37 miles NE. of Baltimore. A long railroad bridge connects Perryville with Havre de Grace. Pop. in 1900, 770. It has a stove-foundry and fertilizer-works.

Perryville, a banking city, capital of Perry co., Mo., on the Chester, Perryville and Ste. Genevieve R., 14 miles S. of Chester, Ill. Pop. in 1900, 848.

Perryville, a post-village of Madison co., N.Y., 20 miles ESE. of Syracuse. Pop. about 175.

Perryville, a post-village of Decatur co., Tenn., on the W. bank of the Tennessee River and on the Nashville, Chattanooga and St. Louis R., 100 miles WSW. of Nashville. Pop. 100.

Perryville, a post-village of Wood co., Tex. The banking point is Pittsburg. Pop. 95.

Persante, pĕr'sän-tä, a river of Prussia, in Pomerania, rises near the village of Persanzig and after a NW. course of 100 miles enters the Baltic at Kolberg.

Persep'olis, the capital of the ancient Persian kingdom, the ruins of which exist about 30 miles NE. of Shiraz.

Per'shore, a small town of England, co. and 8½ miles SE. of Worcester, on the navigable Avon. It has a large cruciform church, originally part of an ancient abbey. Pop. about 3500.

Persia, pẹr'shạ, pẹr'zhạ, or pẹr'she-ạ (Arabic and Persian, Iran, ee'rân'; L. Persia; Gr. Περσίς Persis), a country of Asia, between lat. 25° and 39° 45′ N. and lon. 44° and 63° E., having W. Asiatic Turkey, N. Transcaucasia (part of the Russian Empire), the Caspian Sea, and the Russian Transcaspian Territory, E. Afghanistan and Beluchistan, and S. the Arabian Sea and Persian Gulf. Area, about 640,000 sq. m.

Face of the Country.—Persia may be described as consisting of a plateau from 2500 to 3500 feet in elevation, a series of mountain-chains encircling the plateau on all sides except the E., and, in some places, an outer border of more or less width, consisting for the most part of gentle slopes, low valleys, and level plains. The E. part of the plateau, which is in itself traversed by irregular mountain elevations, forms the great salt desert (Dasht-i-Kavir) of Khorassan—with its vast deposits of solid rock salt—and the sand desert (Dasht-i-Lut) of Kerman. It is comprised in that sterile zone which extends from the Atlantic Ocean through Africa, Arabia, Central Asia, and Mongolia to the N. frontier of the Chinese Empire. The plateau seems to overlie a series of mountain-ridges whose crests and troughs have become deeply covered with sediment and which appear at intervals rising above the general plateau surface. The mountains which enclose the plateau generally have their slopes clothed with a rich and varied vegetation, except those in the south, the southern exposure of which is so hot as to render them scarcely fit for human habitation. This excessive temperature is also found in parts of the plains of the W., where moisture is often in excess and forms extensive swamps. The provinces bordering on the Caspian, however, are strikingly beautiful, well watered and wooded, and offer a great contrast to other districts.

Of the mountains, the N. chain, branching from the Hindu-Kush, or its more westerly continuation, the Sefid-Koh (Paropamisan mountains), by which it is linked to the Himalayas, traverses Afghanistan and enters Persia on its NE. frontier, near lon. 61° E. (NW. of the town of Herat, in Afghanistan), where it forms a mountain-region, in some parts 200 miles wide. Under the name of the mountains of Khorassan, and on its outer or Russian border as the Daman-i-Koh, it proceeds in a WNW. direction across the N. part of the province of Khorassan, but it attains no very great elevation before the Caspian is approached. The chain here merges into the Elburz mountains, which on the borders of the provinces of Irak-Ajemi and Mazanderan attain, in the volcanic Mount Demavend, the height of nearly or over 18,000 feet. From this peak the Elburz stretches WNW. in a number of separate lofty ranges, still maintaining an elevation so great that several of its ridges continue covered with snow till the beginning of June. The Elburz chain, which many consider as terminating nearly opposite to the SW. corner of the Caspian Sea, is succeeded by the Massula mountains and then by Mount Sevellan (or Savalan), which is thought to attain an elevation of nearly 14,000 ft. In the extreme NW. is Mount Ararat (about 17,000 ft.). This celebrated volcanic mountain, situated on the borders of Russian, Persian, and Turkish Armenia, forms the link between the N. and W. ranges of Persia. The western ranges of Persia (collectively known for a part of their extent as the Zagros Mountains) are connected with the great highland of Armenia on the NW. They and their continuations, together with other parallel ranges, extend in direct NW.–SE. courses through the entire country, and eastward through Mekran into Beluchistan. They are also of great height, attaining in the Koh-i-Dena an absolute elevation of 17,000 ft. above the sea. The innermost chain (or Korud) rises to 12,000–13,000 ft.

Excepting the Aras, which forms the NW. frontier, the Kizil-Uzen (known in its lower course as the Sefid-Rud) and the Gurgan, which enter the Caspian Sea, the Kerah, Karun, Jerahi, etc., affluents of the Tigris and Shat-el-Arab, in Khuzistan, and the Bendemir, the rivers of Persia are quite insignificant, and by far the greater portion of the country is arid and unproductive. The Karun is virtually the only stream that is navigable for (small) steamers. From the S. slopes of the mountain-ranges which rise from the northern edge of the country, much water, partly the product of perpetual snow, descends in streams which soon reach the borders of deserts and are absorbed. The N. slopes are so near the basin of the Caspian that the water which they supply has too short a course to allow it to accumulate into rivers. The principal exception is furnished by the Kizil-Uzen (Sefid-Rud), which breaks through the mountains of Massula and reaches the Caspian Sea by the Rudbar Pass in the Elburz, after a course of about 350 miles. In Persia there are more than 30 salt lakes which have no outlets. Lake Urumiah, not far from the Turkish frontier in the NW., about 80 miles long, receives upward of a dozen streams, yet its waters are so bitter and saline that fish cannot live in them. Lake Bakhtegan (or Niriz), in Farsistan, receives the waters of the Bendemir. On the Afghan border is the vast morass of Hamun, otherwise known as Lake Seistan, which, at periods of high water, receives the Helmund (from Afghanistan).

Climate, Productions, Fauna.—On the central plateau the climate is intensely cold in winter (especially in February) and excessively hot in summer. The dryness of the atmosphere, however, makes the air generally pure. The shores of the Persian Gulf are scorched in summer by a burning heat. On the S. side of the northern mountain-ranges snow falls early in November. In such situations as that of Teheran ice is seen up to the middle of March; cold winds from the N. prevail in April, and even during summer great and sudden changes of temperature are not uncommon. At Teheran the most agreeable month is usually October. On the N. side of the mountains, in the plains of Ghilan and Mazanderan, a dry and a rainy season regularly alternate, and vegetation has a luxuriance not often met with in much lower latitudes. Except on the borders of the Caspian, in certain districts along the Persian Gulf, and in the far NW., there are few localities in which the annual rainfall exceeds 10 inches.

The long belt of sandy shores which lines the Persian Gulf is barren, except where it is interspersed with plantations of date-trees, which here grow to great perfection. Among the mountains of Khuzistan and Luristan forests of oak and other trees are not uncommon, though in general they are stunted in their growth. But on the N. side of the lofty ranges which overlook the Caspian Sea are magnificent forests of oak, ash, beech, elm, alder, birch, sycamore, walnut, box, cypress, and cedar. The ordinary European fruit-trees are largely grown in this region. Extensive open glades often occur, on which numerous herds of cattle are reared. In the level and low-lying plains the sugar-cane and orange come to perfection, the pomegranate grows, the cotton-plant and mulberry are extensively cultivated, large tracts are occupied by the vine, and orchards with exquisite fruit are seen. Among the cultivated flowers the Persian roses are famous. In the basal plains the only grain under extensive culture is rice; and the principal auxiliary crops are cotton, indigo, sugar, madder, and tobacco. In Azerbaijan, large rice-fields occupy the low flats which surround Lake Urumiah.

The wild animals comprise the lion, leopard (including the chetah, used for hunting), tiger (in the Caspian region), lynx, bear, wild boar, hyena, wolf, jackal, porcupine, wild ass, gazelle, deer, and mountain sheep and goat. Among domestic quadrupeds the horse, mule, camel, and ox occupy a prominent position. This country is the home of the much-prized "Persian cat." Among the birds are pheasants, pelicans, bustards, blackbirds, thrushes, and other well-known songsters, especially the bulbul. Locusts often commit fearful ravages. Fish abound in the Caspian and on the shores of the Persian Gulf.

The mineral wealth of Persia appears to be fairly great, but mining, owing to the general absence of good roads and lack of enterprise, is but indifferently prosecuted. The minerals include lead, copper, iron, silver, tin, antimony, arsenic, nickel, and cobalt. Good coal has been found at a number of places (near Teheran and elsewhere), and in thick seams. Sulphur exists in minor quantities and salt pits are abundant. Naphtha occurs in a broad zone extending from Kurdistan to the Persian Gulf. Among the non-metallic minerals the turquoise, which is extensively mined near Nishapur, is famous.

Manufactures and Commerce.—Among the leading manufactures of Persia may be mentioned various kinds of silk goods, as taffetas, velvets, and brocades; carpets and rugs of great artistic excellence; shawls, made of the wool of the goats of Kerman; arms, copper-ware, gold brocades, and felt goods.

The commerce of the country is extensive, notwithstanding the general absence of roads except such as are traversed by caravans of mules. The principal articles imported are cotton and woollen fabrics, sugar, cloth, glass, hardware, carriages, petroleum, tea, coffee, and drugs. The exports are silk and other stuffs, articles of gold and silver, copper-ware, carpets, shawls, raw cotton, cocoons, rice, tobacco, pearls, turquoises, dates, lemons, dried fruit, opium, etc. The chief centres of commerce are Tabriz, Teheran, and Ispahan. The more important ports are: Bender Abbas, Lingah, and Bushire, on the Persian Gulf; and Enzeli (the port of Resht), Meshhed-i-Sar (the port of Balfrush), and Bender-i-Ghez, on the Caspian Sea. There is but a single line of railway in operation in Persia, that connecting Teheran with Shah Abdul-Azim, completed in 1888, and covering 6 miles. Almost the only roads or highways available for carriages are those connecting Teheran with Resht and Teheran with Kom, the former 220 miles in length, and the latter 91 miles. An improved mule or caravan track also connects Ahwaz with the Karun River. The telegraph lines extend over nearly 6000 miles. The traffic of the Caspian is almost entirely monopolized by Russia; that of the Persian Gulf employs a considerable number of vessels, owned for the most part by British, Armenian, Arab, and Indian traders.

Government.—The sovereign (or shah) of Persia is an absolute despot. His principal ministers were until recently the vizir (or sadr) azem (or grand vizier) and the amir-a-dulah (or lord high treasurer). Both ministers, though the mere slaves of their master, were, in regard to all other persons, as absolute as himself. At the present time there is a ministry of several departments, after the European fashion. The provinces are governed by governors-general and lieutenant-governors. The greatest corruption prevails in the administration. Justice is administered by two classes of courts, one deciding according to the Koran and the other according to customary law.

Population.—The population of Persia is estimated at about 9,000,000. In addition to the Persians, who constitute the great mass of the inhabitants, there are Kurds, Armenians, Arabs, Turkomans, Beluchis, Jews, Gypsies, etc. Perhaps one-fourth of the people are nomads. The Persians are the chief representatives of the Iranian branch of the Indo-European race. Their Aryan blood has been largely tinged with Turco-Tartar, Semitic, and other elements. The Tajiks constitute the bulk of the sedentary Persian population. In the SW. and W. are the Iranian Luris, a people of mountaineers. The Persians are an intellectually well-endowed race, of quick apprehension, imagination, and a lively temperament, and imbued with a strong love for their language and their exquisite national poetry. They are of agreeable address, but reputed to be very untrustworthy. The sedentary population belongs mainly to the Shia sect of the Mohammedans. The nomads are generally Sunnites. A remnant of the Ghebers (Parsees), or fire-worshippers, survives in Yezd and Kerman. There is a considerable body of native Christians along the W. border.

Persia consists of the following divisions: Azerbaijan, Irak-Ajemi, Ardelan, Luristan, Khuzistan, Fars, Laristan, Kerman, Ghilan, Mazanderan, Astrabad, and Khorassan.

The most important cities are Teheran (the capital), with a population of about 250,000; Tabriz, 180,000; Ispahan, 80,000; Meshed, 60,000; Kerman, 50,000–70,000; Yezd, 50,000 (?); Resht, 40,000; and Kasvin, 40,000.

History.—About 550 B.C. a Persian kingdom was established by Cyrus on the ruins of the Median monarchy. Its dominions were extended by him and his immediate successors so that they stretched from the Mediterranean to the Indus and embraced Egypt. In the year 480 B.C. King Xerxes, at the head of a gigantic army, sought to effect the conquest of Greece, but he met with disaster. A century and a half later, in 334–331 B.C., Alexander of Macedon made himself master of the Persian empire, which, at his death, was divided among his successors. After Persia had for some centuries formed part of the Parthian realm, a new Persian kingdom arose about A.D. 226 under the dynasty of the Sassanidæ. About 642 the country became a conquest of the Saracens (Arabs), who established Mohammedanism. The rule of the caliphs lasted until the ninth century. In the first half of the eleventh century the Seljuk Turks made themselves masters of Persia. Towards the close of the twelfth century the Khowaresmians put an end to the Seljuk power. In the early part of the thirteenth century Persia became the prey of the Mongols under Genghis Khan. Towards the close of the fourteenth century Timur, with his Mongol horde, swept over the country. The Sofi dynasty, founded in 1502, reached its greatest prosperity during the reign of Abbas the Great, 1586–1628. The sceptre of Persia was held from 1736 to 1747 by Nadir Shah, a warrior ruler who invaded India in 1739 and entered Delhi. In 1795 Aga Mohammed, the founder of the present Kajar dynasty, ascended the throne. In 1827 Russia conquered the greater part of Persian Armenia. Persia was at war with the India government in 1856–57. In spite of the efforts of the English to secure the ascendency, Russian influence in trade and the economic development of the country has become paramount in the entire northern section of the kingdom.

Persia, a banking post-town of Harrison co., Iowa, in a farming and stock-raising region, 29 miles NE. by N. of Council Bluffs, on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul R. Pop. in 1900, 361.

Persia, a post-township (town) of Cattaraugus co., N.Y., about 24 miles ESE. of Dunkirk. It contains part of Gowanda village. Pop. in 1900, 1940.

Persia, a post-hamlet of Hawkins co., Tenn.

Persian Gulf (anc. Per'sicus Sinus, or Persicum Mare), an arm of the Indian Ocean, between Arabia and Persia. Lat. from 24° to 30° N. Length, 520 miles; greatest breadth, 220 miles. At its NW. extremity it receives the Shat-el-Arab (formed by the union of the Euphrates and Tigris). It communicates E. with the Arabian Sea by the Strait of Ormuz, about 50 miles across. It contains numerous islands, the principal being Kishm, off its N. (or Persian) coast, and the Bahrein Islands, on its Arabian side; around the latter an extensive pearl-fishery exists. The shores are almost everywhere sterile, flat on the Arabian side and with plateau-heights on the Persian. The depth is almost everywhere less than 50 fathoms.

Persimmon, a banking post-village of Woodward co., Okla.

Persis, in ancient geography, a region NE. of the Persian Gulf, the nucleus of the Persian monarchy established by Cyrus. It embraced the southwestern part of the present Persian kingdom. A portion of it is the modern Fars (or Farsistan).

Person, a county in the N. part of North Carolina, borders on Virginia. Area, 386 sq. m. It is drained by the Hycootee and Flat rivers. The Dan River touches its NW. corner. Capital, Roxboro. Pop. in 1890, 15,151; in 1900, 16,685.

Personville, a post-village of Limestone co., Tex., about 47 miles WSW. of Palestine. Pop. 100.

Perth, or Perthshire, pẽrth'shir, an east-central county of Scotland. Area, 2528 sq. m. It comprises both a highland and a lowland region, the Grampians extending through it in a SW. and NE. direction. The highest peaks are Benlawers and Ben-More, each nearly 4000 feet in height. The principal lochs are Tay, Earn, Rannoch, Ericht, and Katrine. Perthshire is wholly drained by the Tay and its affluents (the largest of which are the Tummel and Earn), except its S. part, which is drained by the Forth and its affluents, the Teith, Allan, and Devon. There is little agriculture in the mountain districts, which are given over largely to sheep pastures and game preserves. Fine crops are raised in the lowlands. The county as such sends 2 members to the House of Commons. Pop. in 1901, 123,260. Capital, Perth.

Perth, formerly Saint Johnstown (L. Perthia or Bertha), a royal and parliamentary burgh of Scotland, capital of Perthshire, on the right bank of the Tay, here spanned by two fine bridges, 33 miles NNW. of Edinburgh. Its beautiful situation, with the river flowing on one side and the Grampians rising in the background, has won for it the title of the "Fair City." Along the Tay are two fine public parks, known as the South and North Inches. The most interesting edifices are the church of St. John, the Episcopal cathedral of St. Ninian's, and the town-hall. The industries comprise iron-founding, shipbuilding, and bleaching, and the manufacture of ink, glass, cotton, etc. The salmon-fishery is extensively carried on in the river. Perth is rich in historic memories. It sends 1 member to the House of Commons. Pop. in 1901, 32,872.

Perth, a post-village of Clay co., Ind., on the Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis R. The banking point is Brazil. Pop. about 400.

Perth, a banking post-town of Sumner co., Kan., on the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé and the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Rs. Pop. 200.

Perth, a post-village of Fulton co., N.Y., in Perth township (town), 6 miles N. of Amsterdam. Pop. about 150; of the town in 1900, 667.

Perth, a post-village of Towner co., N.Dak., on the Great Northern R., 20 miles NW. of Cando.

Perth, a post-village of Victoria co., New Brunswick, on the river St. John, 45 miles N. of Woodstock. Pop. about 500.

Perth, a banking post-town and outport, capital of Lanark co., Ontario, on the river Tay, which has been rendered navigable to the Rideau Canal, and on the Canadian Pacific R., 40 miles NW. of Brockville. It contains railroad-shops, distilleries, a foundry, and manufactories of car-wheels, woollens, and knit goods. Near here are large mineral deposits. Pop. in 1901, 3588.

Perth, a city, capital of Western Australia, on the Swan River, 12 miles above Fremantle. Lat. 31° 57′ S.; lon. 115° 53′ E. It has a city-hall, barracks, governor's palace, mechanics' institute, observatory, etc., and the extensive Perth Park. It is the seat of Catholic and Anglican bishops. Pop. in 1901, 27,553; in 1903, inclusive of suburbs, 44,373 (estimated); of the magisterial district, 40,000.

Perth Am'boy', a city and port of entry of Middlesex co., N.J., is situated on Raritan Bay, at the mouth of Raritan River, and at the S. end of Staten Island Sound, opposite Tottenville, N.Y., 21 miles SW. of New York city, on the Pennsylvania, the Lehigh Valley, and other railroads. It has a good harbor, with dry-docks. The city has important manufacturing and other industries, which are represented by iron-foundries, smelting-, refining- and chemical-works, and manufactures of fire- and other bricks, white-ware, drain-pipes, terra-cotta, emery, cork, boats, and gasoline-launches. Here are large deposits of fire-clay and kaolin. During the greater part of the existence of New Jersey as a colony its seat of government was at Perth Amboy. Pop. in 1880, 4808; in 1890, 9512; in 1900, 17,699.

Perthshire, a county of Scotland. See PERTH.

Pertuis, pẽr'twee', a town of France, in Vaucluse, 44 miles ESE. of Avignon. Pop. in 1901, 4027.

Peru, pe-roo' (Sp. Perú, pā'roo'), a republic of South America, stretching along the Pacific Ocean between lat. 3° 25′ and 18° S., and having N. Ecuador, E. Brazil and Bolivia, and S. Chile. Length, about 1100 miles. Area, about 690,000 sq. m. It is divided into 17 departments (subdivided into provinces) and 2 provinces (not included in departments): Piura, Cajamarca, Amazonas, Loreto, Libertad, Ancachs, Lima, Callao (province), Huancavelica, Huánuco, Junín, Ica, Ayacucho, Cuzco, Puno, Arequipa, Moquegua (province), Apurimac, Lambayeque. Tacna, a province of Chile since the war of 1879–83, is still officially included in Peru.

Relief of the Land, Rivers.—Peru is properly divisible into three physiographic sections, which run more or less parallel with each other and with the coast. 1. The coastal region, La Cuesta, which lies between the western base of the Andes and the shores of the Pacific, mostly an arid desert (except in the NW.), and having an average width of about 20 miles. It is intersected at intervals by fertilizing streams, which support a beautiful vegetation, and along which are wide expanses of vineyards, sugar-cane and cotton plantations, and fruit-gardens. 2. The Sierra region (or Andean division), which takes in the region of the high Andes, consisting of the Maritime, Central, and Eastern (or Oriental) Cordilleras. This region of broad extent is made up of lofty mountain-spurs, elevated valleys, and deep ravines. Much of it, between the western and middle chains of mountains, is the cold and inhospitable tract known as the Puna (or the Páramos), occupying elevations of 13,000 feet and more. The loftiest summits of the Cordilleras rise high above the snow-line, and several of them seem to attain an elevation of 20,000 ft. or more. Perhaps the loftiest of all these is the Huascán, twin-peaked, in about lat. 8° 30′ S., which is thought to exceed 20,000 (22,000?) ft. In the S. of Peru, associated with the Maritime Cordillera, are a number of giant volcanoes (Chachani, Mistí, or the volcano of Arequipa, Coropuna) whose elevations are variously stated at from 18,000 to 20,000 ft. Some of these have had violent eruptions as late as the close of the eighteenth century. There is a general convergence of the mountain systems of Peru in what is known as the knot of Cerro de Pasco, between lats. 10° and 11° S. In the SE. part of the country, and extending into Bolivia, is the interesting basin of Lake Titicaca, the surface of which lies 12,500 ft. above the sea. 3. The third natural region of Peru is the Montaña, from the Spanish word monte, meaning a wood or thicket. A few miles beyond the eastern crest of the Cordilleras is the warm and steaming woodland, which stretches into the Brazilian territory and contains the head-waters of many streams flowing into the Amazon. The chief rivers of Peru are the Marañon, Huallaga, Ucayali, Apurimac, and Jabary, all having a N. course and being tributaries to or forming the Amazon. In the SE. is the Madre de Dios, one of the head-streams of the Beni (or Madeira). About half of Lake Titicaca is comprised in southern Peru.

Climate, Productions, Transportation, etc.—Rain rarely falls in the coast valleys of Peru W. of the Andes, but fogs, called the garua, are frequent. The amount of rain diminishes gradually from the southern tropics to the N. borders of Peru. The climate on the coast is sultry and unhealthy, but higher up it is mild and salubrious. The mean temperature at Lima in summer is 80° to 84°; minimum in winter, 60° to 64° Fahr. On the E. slopes of the Peruvian Andes rain falls copiously. The soil in the valleys of the upland region is highly fertile and the grains of Europe are successfully raised, even at altitudes of 13,000–14,000 feet. The vast plains E. of the mountains, as already noted, are in great part covered with dense forests. In the hotter portions of the country, sugar, wheat, maize, cotton, indigo, tobacco, yams, sweet potatoes, cacao, and fine fruits, with cinchona bark, sarsaparilla, copaiba, vanilla, and other drugs, and valuable timber, are the principal products. Many of the rich valleys here have an insalubrious climate. The chief productions of Peru are coffee (mainly in the central part), sugar (chiefly in the coast region), cotton, cacao, and coca. The quantity of sugar exported in 1901 was 114,637 tons, and of coca, 610 tons (besides 10.7 tons of cocaine). Rubber is shipped down the Amazon from Iquitos in large quantities. The domestic animals generally bred are the same as in the United States. The llama, alpaca, guanaco, and vicuña are natives of the country, and the first especially is used as a beast of burden; mules are, however, mostly employed for travelling. The alpaca is bred for its wool. There are extensive pastures, where sheep introduced by Europeans have been acclimatized and multiply with great rapidity. The country is extremely rich in mineral resources. The mines of Peru were for a long time the principal source of its wealth; but the mining-industry still continues in great decadence, owing to the absence of capitalists and roads. The silver-mines of Cerro de Pasco are the richest in the republic. Gold is found in most of the departments, and there is considerable copper, with lead, bismuth, tin, etc. At Huancavelica is a celebrated mine of quicksilver. The quantity of silver produced and melted into bars at Cerro de Pasco, in 1901, was 1,000,000 ounces; the quantity of copper exported from the same place was 16,800 tons. Deposits of coal are worked at Huamacho. The manufacturing industries of Peru are but little developed, and in general manufactured goods outside of what can readily be produced on a small scale are imported from Europe and North America, in return for raw produce. There are some manufactures of cotton and coarse woollen fabrics, boots and shoes, saddlery, furniture, machinery, sugar, hats (made by the Indians), etc. The bulk of the foreign trade of the republic is with Great Britain, the United States, and Germany. Great Britain takes about half of the exports. An important source of wealth was for some time the immense deposits of guano on the islands and coasts of the republic; but the main deposits of the Chincha Islands were exhausted in 1872, and now only minor quantities are obtainable on the islets that still belong to Peru (Lobos de Afuera). The want of roads interposes great obstacles to internal traffic; but several railways are in operation, connecting the interior districts with the ports, which, in connection with steamers launched on Lake Titicaca, facilitate the trade of the interior. One of the most remarkable of all railways is that connecting Lima and Oroya (and Cerro de Pasco), which crosses the Andes at an elevation of 15,645 ft.; and hardly less noteworthy is the road uniting Mollendo with Puno, on Lake Titicaca. The mileage of operating roads, in 1902, was 1035.

Government, etc.—The present constitution of Peru was proclaimed in 1856 and revised in 1860. The affairs of the country are directed by a president, elected for a term of 4 years, and a cabinet of 6 ministers. The legislative body consists of a senate and a house of representatives. The individual departments are represented in the senate by from 1 to 4 members. The term of members in both houses is 6 years. The Roman Catholic is the state religion. Public instruction has made little progress, and in the interior not more than two per cent. of the youths receive education. There are four universities,—at Lima, Cuzco, Arequipa, and Trujillo.

Population, Cities.—There has been no census of Peru since 1876. At that time the population within the present limits of the republic was about 3,000,000. It is not certain that there has been a great increase since, in spite of the estimate of 4,600,000 for the year 1896, made by the Geographical Society of Lima. More than one-half of the inhabitants are Indians, who belong to the Quichuan and Aymará stocks. The bulk of the remainder are mestizos, the pure whites, mainly descendants of the Spaniards, comprising about one-eighth (or even less) of the population. The chief ports are Callao (the port of Lima), Chimbote, Etén, Islay, Pisco, Ilo, Payta, Huacho, Mollendo, Salaverry, and Trujillo. Among the interior towns the more important are Lima (the capital), Huaraz (which had about 130,000 inhabitants in 1903), Arequipa, Chiclayo, Ayacucho, Cuzco, and Huancavelica.

History.—The empire of the Incas (whose subjects were mainly Quichua Indians), which embraced Peru and a vast region to the N., E., and S., was at the height of its power at the advent of the Spaniards. The remains of the stupendous public works executed by the dynasty of the Incas attest the relatively high degree of civilization attained by the Indians in this part of America. Pizarro achieved the conquest of Peru in 1531–33. The territories included within the present Ecuador, Bolivia, and Argentina originally formed part of the vice-royalty of Peru, from which they were detached in the course of the eighteenth century. In 1821 San Martin, the liberator of Chile from Spanish rule, made his entry into Lima and proclaimed the independence of Peru. The victory of General Sucre over the Spaniards at Ayacucho in Dec., 1824, virtually secured the liberation of the country. Callao, the last post of the Spaniards in South America, was evacuated in 1826. Peru, in alliance with Bolivia, waged a disastrous war with Chile in 1879–83, which cost her the district of Tarapacá and the territories of Tacna and Arica.

48 miles SE. of Arezzo and 10 miles E. of the Lake of Perugia, on the S. declivity of the Apennines. Pop. in 1901, 20,580; of the commune, 61,385. It contains a number of notable public edifices, including the Gothic cathedral of San Lorenzo (fifteenth century), other interesting churches, with fine paintings, a vast municipal palace, and an exchange, gorgeously decorated with frescoes. Perugia possesses a university (founded about 1266, with museums of antiquities and minerals, a library, etc), an academy of fine arts, a public library of 60,000 volumes, and the Collegio della Sapienza. There are two celebrated gates of Etruscan architecture. Perugai occupies a prominent place in the history of Italian painting; from it proceeded the Umbrian school. The manufactures of the town are not important. It has a trade in wine, oil, corn, fruits, etc. Perugia (Perusia) was one of the 12 cities of the Etruscan League. It submitted to the Romans about the close of the fourth century B.C. The city was one of the early possessions of the popes, but in mediæval times it at different periods asserted its independence, its dominion finally extending over Umbria. The papal authority was permanently established in the sixteenth century. In 1860 Umbria was annexed to the dominions of Victor Emmanuel.

Pesaro, pĕz'ā-ro (anc. Pisau'rum), a town of Italy, the capital of the province of Pesaro e Urbino, 19 miles NE. of Urbino, on the Foglia, at its mouth in the Adriatic Sea. Its old fortifications still survive in part, its mediæval castle being used as a prison. With its churches (including an old and a new cathedral), its ancient palaces, its public squares and sculptural monuments, it is one of the most interesting of the towns on the E. coast of Italy. The splendid palace of the dukes of Urbino is now the prefecture. There is a museum with notable collections, including one of majolica, for the manufacture of which Pesaro was formerly celebrated. The town possesses a school of music, founded by Rossini, who was born here. Pesaro has considerable manufactures and an active trade in the produce of the district, whose figs are in high repute. The town became a papal possession in the eighth century, but in the last two centuries of the Middle Ages and later for about a century and a half, it was under the sway of petty dynasties, including the houses of Malatesta, Sforza, and Rovere. In 1631 it passed again to the popes, who retained it until 1860. Pop. in 1901, 14,862 (commune, 25,103).

Philadelphia, a port of entry, the third city in population of the United States, the metropolis of Pennsylvania, coextensive with the co. of Philadelphia, is situated on the W. bank of the Delaware River, 96 miles (by the ship-channel) from the open sea, 90 miles by rail SW. of New York, and 136 miles NE. of Washington, D.C. Lat. 39° 57′ N.; lon. 75° 10′ W. The Schuylkill River, which is here crossed by a number of railway and passenger bridges, traverses the city, dividing the part known as West Philadelphia from the older portion. Along the Delaware the water-front measures 23 miles, extending from the mouth of Poquessing Creek (which enters the Delaware near Torresdale on the NE.), southwestward and southward, to the embouchure of Bow Creek, at Tinicum Island. The area of the municipality is 130 sq. m., of which a considerable part, especially in the N., is rural in character, while other portions are occupied by suburban districts, embracing several places which have almost the character of separate towns,—such as Germantown, Chestnut Hill, Frankford, Manayunk, Falls of Schuylkill, Wissahickon, Bridesburg, and Holmesburg,—with many minor villages, hamlets, and stations, the principal of which are Tacony, Torresdale, Byberry, Somerton, Bustleton, Olney, Oxford Church, Roxboro, Milestown, Logan, Tabor, Fox Chase, etc. A number of the former independent towns or districts, such as Tioga, Nicetown, Kensington, and Richmond, still retain their names to indicate sections of the city. The natural features of the site occupied by Philadelphia are varied. Much of the land near the rivers, especially southward, is flat and low, but in the N., W., and central districts the ground is high and easily drained, the deep subsoil being mostly a dry gravel, resting upon gneiss and schist, although it is in part composed of a tough clay. In the highest parts of Germantown and Chestnut Hill the elevation exceeds 400 feet above sea-level. The city is remarkable for the regularity of its plan, the streets mostly crossing one another at right angles and dividing the town into uniform squares,—those running N. and S. being named by the ordinal numbers from the Delaware westward. A great part of the city is built of the excellent bricks for which Philadelphia is noted. The older parts present many streets of very uniform and somewhat monotonous aspect, but latterly this uniformity has been much broken by the construction of buildings in every variety of style. Especially is this noticeable in the newer northern and western sections of the city and in the heart of the business quarter, where an imposing massive architecture has been introduced. Philadelphia, known as the "city of homes," perhaps surpasses every other large city of the world in the home comforts which it affords to the people of the middle class. The suburban sections, such as Germantown and Chestnut Hill, are unsurpassed for their charms. In 1905 there were 282,117 dwellings. The main business thoroughfares are Market Street, a broad avenue, and Chestnut Street, with elegant shops, the seat of the principal financial institutions of the city. Walnut Street, in its western part, is the most exclusive of the residence streets, but is not distinguished by any very notable architectural features. Somewhat more imposing in this respect is the capacious avenue known as Broad Street, which traverses the greater part of the built-up portion of the city in a N. and S. line and at whose intersection with Market Street is the new city-hall. This vast granitic and marble pile, commonly known as the Public Buildings, whose construction was begun in 1874, covers an area of 4½ acres and cost, inclusive of its furnishings, about $27,000,000. It measures 486½ ft. by 470 ft. and rises to a height of 547 ft., its huge tower being capped by a colossal statue of William Penn.

Philadelphia has numerous parks and public squares, one of which, Fairmount Park, contains about 2900 acres and takes rank, for extent, natural attractions, and artificial improvements, among the foremost in the world. It is traversed in part by the Schuylkill River and by Wissahickon Creek, the latter being noted for the romantic wildness of the deep glen through which it flows. Among the noted squares are Independence, Franklin, Washington, Logan, and Rittenhouse, the last-named representing perhaps the most fashionable quarter of the city. Several of the cemeteries are distinguished for excellent landscape effects and costly monumental decoration, notably that of Laurel Hill, on the E. bank of the Schuylkill. The streets of the city are provided with a vast system of electric surface railways, and an extensive "subway" approach from the more distant outlying quarters is now, 1905, nearing completion.

The educational institutions and those devoted to higher research are numerous. At the head of the public school system are the boys' high school and the girls' normal and high schools. The University of Pennsylvania, founded in 1740, has spacious and elegant buildings, includes medical, scientific, legal, and art schools, and has under its management a commodious hospital, laboratories of hygiene and general biology, the Wistar Institute of Anatomy and Biology, the Flower Astronomical Observatory (lat. 39° 58′ 2″ N.; lon. 75° 16′ 39″ W.), extensive museums of archæology and ethnology, and a library of upward of 200,000 volumes. The number of students registered in the year 1903–04 was 2692. The Jefferson Medical College, founded in 1825, is one of the leading medical institutions of the country. Other institutions of a related nature are the Philadelphia Medico-Chirurgical College, also with extensive hospitals, the Woman's Medical College, Hahnemann College, Philadelphia College of Pharmacy, Pennsylvania and Philadelphia Dental Colleges, etc. Among the educational institutions of a more general character are the Drexel Institute of Art, Science, and Industry, developed upon a private foundation (1892), with well-equipped laboratories and work-shops, and attended by nearly 3000 students; Williamson Free School of Mechanical Trades, located outside of the city limits, but properly a city foundation; and the famous Girard College, founded through the munificence of Stephen Girard (opened in 1848), which affords instruction and support to thousands of orphan boys. Other institutions of general learning are the Friends' and the Roman Catholic high schools and the William Penn Charter School. The principal art institutions are the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts, with schools and large collections, the School of Design for Women, School of Industrial Art, and the Spring Garden Institute. The chief scientific institutions are the Academy of Natural Sciences, founded in 1812, with extensive collections in natural history; the American Philosophical Society, the oldest scientific association in the country, founded by Benjamin Franklin in 1743; and the Franklin Institute, founded in 1824. Other learned bodies and foundations are the Pennsylvania Historical Society, Wagner Free Institute of Science, the Geographical Society, American Academy of Political and Social Science, Zoological Society (under whose charge are the zoological gardens located in Fairmount Park), and the Numismatic and Antiquarian Society. The Philadelphia Commercial Museum was founded in 1895 to obtain and disseminate knowledge regarding the products and trade-requirements of foreign parts of the world, and contains important collections. The Philadelphia Library, with the Ridgway and other branches, has a large and choice collection of books, numbering upward of 250,000 volumes. There are many other large libraries in the city, those of the College of Physicians and of most of the learned societies already mentioned being particularly noteworthy.

Among the prominent buildings that have not yet been referred to are the historic Independence Hall (1732–35), where the Continental Congress met during the period of the American Revolution, and where the Declaration of Independence was adopted on July 4, 1776; Carpenters' Hall, where the first Continental Congress assembled in 1774; the post-office, United States custom-house, the masonic temple (a splendid building in the Norman style), the new United States mint, the bourse, the extensive depots of the two trunk lines of railroad entering the heart of the city, the naval asylum and hospital, the United States arsenals, the Philadelphia hospital and almshouse, Pennsylvania Institution for the Deaf and Dumb at Mount Airy, Pennsylvania insane asylum, Pennsylvania hospital, Eastern Penitentiary, Moyamensing prison, Memorial Hall (with valuable paintings) and Horticultural Hall, in West Fairmount Park, the last two stately structures, which were originally erected for use in the great Centennial Exhibition of 1876. The city contains few sculptural works of note, the most imposing being the Washington Monument, by Siemering, of Berlin, standing at one of the entrances to Fairmount Park.

Among the handsomest or most interesting of the ecclesiastical edifices are the old Swedes' Church, erected, on an earlier church site, in 1700; Christ Church, St. Mark's Church, Holy Trinity, the Baptist Temple, with accommodation for 6000 worshippers, the Jewish synagogues, and the cathedral church of St. Peter and St. Paul (Roman Catholic). Philadelphia is the seat of an Episcopalian bishop and of a Roman Catholic archbishop. There are numerous buildings of historic interest from their association with persons and events prominent in the colonial and Revolutionary periods.

Accessible from the sea by the largest merchant steamers, connected by navigable waters and by lines of railway with the anthracite coal regions of the state, and being the centre of a system of important railways (the Pennsylvania, the Baltimore and Ohio, and the Philadelphia and Reading), Philadelphia takes a high rank as a seat of foreign, domestic, and coastwise trade. Leading articles of export are corn, flour, coal, petroleum, machinery, live-stock, and animal products. Lines of steamers connect the city with Liverpool and other European ports, the West Indies, and nearly all the important ports of the United States. At League Island, in the S. portion of the city, is one of the largest of the United States navy-yards and near it is Fort Mifflin, the principal defensive military work near the city. The value of exports from the port in 1901 was $79,000,000, and of imports, $48,000,000. The number of American and foreign vessels entering the port of Philadelphia during the year 1901 was 1108, with an aggregate tonnage of 1,807,623; the entering tonnage in 1904 was 1,712,052.

The manufactures of Philadelphia stand second in importance to those of New York. Some of the outer wards (formerly the suburban villages and districts of Manayunk, Kensington, etc.) are largely occupied by manufacturing establishments, many of them of immense extent. The value of the product in 1901 was $732,137,957, the chief manufactures being those of machinery, foundry and machine-shop products, iron-wares, drugs and chemicals, cotton and woollen goods, carpets, leather, clothing, worsteds and knitted goods, boots and shoes, glass-ware, cigars and tobacco. The two most important individual industrial establishments of the city, whose product may be said to be of a national character, are the Baldwin Locomotive Works, the largest of their kind in the world, which in 1905 employed upward of 12,000 hands and which turn out 600–700 locomotives a year; and the Cramp Ship-building Yards, one of the chief centres of the construction of iron and steel vessels of war. The publishing interests of Philadelphia have always been prominently linked with the educational development of the country.

An important feature in the social life of Philadelphia is the great number of benevolent, protective, temperance, and friendly associations, a class of organizations which here attain a development greater perhaps than in any other American city.

The city government is vested in a mayor and in a select and a common council. The mayor is elected for a term of 4 years. He has the right of veto of ordinances passed by the councils. The members of the select council are elected for a term of 3 years, and those of the common council for 2 years. The principal social element in colonial days was composed of the Friends, many of whose descendants are still found here. The original Swedish colonists were settled chiefly in the quarter now called Southwark. Germantown was settled by Francis Pastorius, with a colony of Germans holding opinions similar to those of the Quakers. About one-third of the inhabitants of Philadelphia are foreign-born—Germans, Irish, English, Italians, Russian Jews, etc. The population in 1900 included 28,940 negroes and 1277 Chinese, Japanese, and Indians.

History.—In 1638 the Swedes made a settlement within the present limits of Philadelphia, then called by the native name of Wicaco. In 1682 Philadelphia was laid out by William Penn as the capital of his new colony of Pennsylvania. A stone monument marks the place where the treaty is said to have been made between Penn and the Indians. The name of Philadelphia ("brotherly love") was given by Penn both in reference to the ancient city of that name in Asia Minor and from its symbolizing principles he had so much at heart. From 1723 to his death, in 1790, Benjamin Franklin lived in Philadelphia, and made a deep impress upon the public and social life of the city. The first Continental Congress assembled here on Sept. 5, 1774, and during most of the Revolutionary struggle Philadelphia was the meeting-place of Congress. From hence went forth the Declaration of Independence, July 4, 1776. The city was occupied by the British from Sept., 1777, to June, 1778. Philadelphia was the seat of government of the United States from 1790 to 1800. The convention which framed the constitution of the United States met in Philadelphia in 1787. In 1854 the districts of Moyamensing, Southwark, Kensington, Northern Liberties, Spring Garden, and West Philadelphia, and the boroughs and townships of the entire county of Philadelphia, were consolidated with the city proper. In 1876 the one hundredth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence was celebrated by holding an international exposition in Fairmount Park.

The population of Philadelphia was 4500 in the year 1700; in 1750, 12,500; in 1790, 28,522; in 1800, 41,220; in 1840, 93,665 (county, 258,037); in 1860 (the city having become coextensive with the county), 565,529; in 1870, 674,022; in 1880, 847,170; in 1890, 1,046,964; in 1900, 1,293,697.

Philadelphia, a post-station of Darlington co., S.C., about 100 miles N. of Charleston.

Philadelphia, a post-village of Loudon co., Tenn., on the Southern R., 35 miles SW. of Knoxville. Pop. about 330.

Philadelphia, a town of Brazil, in the state of Minas Geraes, about 250 miles NE. of Ouro Preto. It is connected by rail with the port of Caravellas. Pop. about 3000.

Phi'læ, an island of Upper Egypt, in the Nile, above the first cataract, 6 miles SSW. of Assuan, noted for some of the most interesting Egyptian remains that have yet been brought to light. Roman monuments are also found. Among the more famous structures are the temples of Isis and Hathor and Hadrian's Gateway. The island is now in greater part submerged as the result of the construction of the great dam at Assuan.

Philanthropy, a post-station of Butler co., Ohio.

Philbrook, a post-village of Todd co., Minn., on the Northern Pacific R. The banking point is Staples. Pop. 100.

Philbrook, a post-village of Fergus co., Mont. Pop. 55.

Philiates, fe-lā'tēs, a town of European Turkey, in Epirus, vilayet of Janina, 25 miles SE. of Delvino. Pop. about 3000.

Philip, a post-village of Tallahatchie co., Miss. Pop. 75.

Philip Island, a British island in the Pacific Ocean, S. of Norfolk Island. Lat. 29° 5′ S.; lon. 167° 57′ E.

Philip Islands, two small islands of the Carolines.

Philippeville, fee'leep'veel', a small town of Belgium, 25 miles SW. of Namur, on a height in the forest of Ardennes.

Philippeville, fee'leep'veel', a fortified town of Algeria, department and 40 miles N. by E. of Constantine, with which it is connected by rail, on the Gulf of Stora. It has a capacious and well-protected harbor, a fairly extensive commerce, commercial college, museum, military library, etc. The city was founded by the French in 1838. Pop. in 1901, 14,843 (commune, 21,462).

Philip'pi, an ancient city of Macedonia, NE. of Amphipolis, about 10 miles from the Ægean Sea. In the plain W. of it, in 42 B.C., the battles took place in which Octavius and Antony defeated Brutus and Cassius. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians was addressed to the inhabitants of this town.

Philippi, fe-lip'pī or fil'ip-pē, a banking post-town, capital of Barbour co., W.Va., on the Tygart's Valley River, 23 miles S. of Grafton, on the Baltimore and Ohio R. It has milling- and mining-industries. Pop. in 1900, 665. A battle occurred here, June, 1861, between the Federals and a body of Confederates.

Philippine, fee'lip-peen' a village of the Netherlands, in Zeeland, 6½ miles W. of Axel.

Philippine (fil'ip-pin) Islands (Sp. Islas Filipinas, ees'lās fe-le-pee'nās), a large and important group of the Eastern Archipelago, forming its N. division, and constituting, since Dec., 1898, a possession of the United States. They lie chiefly between lat. 5° 25′ and 19° 38′ N. (or, including the Sulu, or Joló, Islands on the S. and the Batanes on the N., which are included within the treaty-rights of the United States, between 4° 40′ and 21° 10′ N.) and lon. 116° 40′ and 126° 34′ E., having N. and E. the Pacific Ocean, W. the China Sea, and S. the Celebes and Sulu seas. There are upward of 1650 named islands and islets and about 1500 unnamed. The principal islands are Luzon, Mindanao, Palawan (Paragua), Mindoro, Panay, Negros, Cebú, Bohol, Leyte, Sámar, and Masbate. Total area of the land-surface, 115,026 sq. m. Pop. as determined by the census of March, 1903, 7,635,426, of which number the island of Luzon contained about one-half, or 3,798,507. The total population was distributed through about 13,400 pueblos or barrios (villages and communes). The islands are largely of volcanic formation and traversed by irregular chains of mountains whose trend is generally N. and S. The chief mountain system is that bearing the name of the Caraballos Mountains, in Luzon. It is divided into three branches,—viz., Cordillera Occidental, Caraballo or Cordillera Central (or del Norte in its more northerly part), and Caraballo de Baler (also known as the Cordillera Oriental and Sierra Madre), the last-named with a southerly extension or transverse arm known as the Caraballo del Sur. (See LUZON.) These mountains rise in numerous crests and summits to 4000–7000 feet (Pagsán, in the Cordillera del Norte, 7260 ft.; Datá, in the Cordillera Central, estimated at from 7400 to 8200 ft.). Their orographic relations have not yet been fully ascertained, and even their nomenclature is variously accepted by different geographers (as seen in the transposition of Caraballo Occidental for Caraballo Central). Southward of Lingayén Gulf and extending to Manila Bay are the Zambales Mountains (4000–5500 ft.), which define in this section the W. coast of the island. Eastward of this range lies the great valley or depression, about 150 miles in length and with an average width of scarcely less than 50 miles, which is traversed in great part by the Rio Grande de la Pampanga, and the lower portion of which is occupied by Manila Bay. In this fertile tract are located about 1,750,000 of the inhabitants, or about two-fifths of the population of the island. In Mindanao are several ranges, and every island has ridges and chains of greater or lesser magnitude. The loftiest or most prominent mountain summits are Apo (or Dávao), a solfataric volcano on Mindanao, 10,311 feet, and the culminating point of the archipelago; Mayón, or Albay (frequently active), in Luzon, 8300 (8900?) ft.; Halcón, on Mindoro, about 8850 ft.; Banájao (Luzon), and Isarog (Luzon). The rivers are numerous and large in the chief islands, which have also lakes or inland seas. Among the rivers are the following: in Luzon, Cagayán (Rio Grande de Cagayán, the largest stream in the island group), Agno Grande, Abra, (Rio Grande de la) Pampanga, Pásig, Bicol, etc.; in Mindanao, Agusán (or Baluán) and Pulangui (or Rio Grande de Mindanao, the second largest of the Philippine rivers); the other islands have numerous streams, many of which are navigable for some distance. Among the lakes are the Laguna de Bay, Taal, Candava, and Bato, in Luzon; Lanao, Maguindanao, and Bulúan, in Mindanao; and Nauján, in Mindoro.

The climate is tropical in general, but varies according to the locality. The mean annual temperature is 80°, with extremes of 100° and 60°. The mean annual rainfall at Manila is 75.43 inches. The group is within the range of the monsoons, and violent hurricanes are frequent. From May to September the W. coasts are deluged with rain, while the October monsoon brings rain to the E. coasts, which are at other seasons dry. The region is pre-eminently one of seismic disturbances, and earthquakes are registered in different parts of the archipelago at intervals of but very few weeks or even days. Some of these are of a markedly destructive character. Among the more recent seismic visitations were those of Dec., 1901, and of Aug., 1902. The high temperature and abundance of moisture produce a luxuriant vegetation, so that the Philippines are capable of yielding all kinds of colonial and a varied European produce. The general features of the indigenous flora ally it to the floras of the larger Sunda Islands,—Borneo and Celebes. Rice, millet, maize, sugar, indigo, hemp, tobacco, coffee, cacao, and cotton are raised; and sago, cocoanuts, bananas, cinnamon, betel, numerous fine fruits, timber for ship-building, and dye-woods are among the products. The area under cultivation is still limited. The forests remain of vast extent and cover 80,000 sq. m. of surface. Gold, silver, copper, lead, iron, and coal (of Tertiary age) are mined in measurable quantities. Sulphur and petroleum are also found. The water-buffalo (or carabao) and most of the domestic animals common in Europe are reared; the horse, introduced by the Spaniards, runs wild among the mountains. The wild animals comprise the antelope, buffalo (or timarau), deer, boar, and monkey; the crocodile is found in the rivers and lakes, the tortoise abounds on the shores; fish are very abundant, and serpents numerous. Among the birds of the islands are the cockatoo, large Gallinaceæ, pigeons, and a mound-turkey (or megapod). The fauna, which most closely resembles that of the neighboring Malayan Islands, shows, in the differentiation of its forms, the effects of long-continued isolation. Pearls, pearl-oyster shell, the sea-slug, and edible birds'-nests are important articles of export to China. The leading industries of the islands are the production and manufacture of hemp (abacá), tobacco and cigars, sugar, and copra, or dried meat of the cocoanut (the export values of which in 1904 were: hemp, $21,794,960; tobacco, $2,003,622; sugar, $2,668,507; and copra, $2,527,019), the manufacture of liquors, ship-building, and the cutting of lumber. Minor industries are represented in printing and publishing and the manufacture of textiles and straw-goods. Domestic weaving is pretty generally carried on by the women. The value of the exports in 1901 was $24,503,353; in 1902, $28,671,904; in 1903, $39,674,328; and in 1904, $37,033,185. The imports for the corresponding years were valued at $30,162,471, $33,342,166, $35,099,835, and $34,327,481. Communication is had with the outside world and between the islands themselves by steamer and telegraph; the inter-island traffic is considerable. The roads are bad, except in the vicinity of Manila, and the railroad between Manila and Dagupan (on Lingayén Gulf), 120 miles in length, is the only one in the islands.

The Philippine Islands are peopled by a large number of tribes, almost wholly of the Malay type, the majority being Tagals and Visayas; the Negritos, or oriental negroes, are supposed to be aboriginal. The Filipinos represent every stage of civilization from savagery to a high state of culture. Eagerness to acquire knowledge and an artistic sense are prominent traits. Some of the native tongues, such as the Tagalog and Visayan, are sufficiently developed to serve for the purposes of literary production. The educated Filipinos are masters of the Spanish language. Industrially the people have advanced only along a few lines. The Roman Catholic religion is largely diffused among the natives; the Moros are Mohammedan Malays. Of the foreign population the census of 1903 showed 8135 born in the United States, 5064 born in Europe (3888 in Spain), 41,635 in China, and 921 in Japan, with a few hundred others not specially classified.

The Philippines were discovered by Magellan in 1521. The foundations of Spanish dominion were laid in 1565–72. Manila was founded in 1571. The rule was oppressive and insurrections were frequent. Towards the close of the Spanish tenure the islands progressed favorably, owing to the abolition of restrictions on trade. In 1898, as a result of the Spanish-American war (the opening episode of which was the battle in Manila Bay), by the treaty of Paris, signed Dec. 10, the Philippines were ceded to the United States, Spain receiving $20,000,000. In Feb., 1899, the Filipinos, under Aguinaldo, rose in arms against the American rule and a fierce struggle ensued. Aguinaldo was captured in March, 1901, and in 1902 civil government was established by the United States throughout the islands. Capital, Manila, on Manila Bay, W. coast of Luzon. In March, 1903, the island-group was divided into 40 civil provinces, 9 military districts, and the city of Manila, the civil provinces in turn being divided into municipalities and townships, and these again into pueblos or barrios (the barrio being a small settlement with outlying territory). The St. Thomas University, with several faculties, including one of medicine, is located in the capital city.

Philip'polis, a district in the S. part of the Orange River Colony, intersected by tributaries of the Orange River. Capital, Philippolis, 110 miles (direct) SW. of Bloemfontein. It has considerable trade.

Philippop'olis (Bulg. Plovdiv; Turk. Filibeh, fee'lebĕh'), a city of Bulgaria, the largest town of Eastern Rumelia, on both sides of the river Maritza, 86 miles WNW. of Adrianople, on the railway between that city and Sofia. It has been largely modernized in recent years and has attractive suburban quarters. It has manufactures of textiles and is a busy commercial centre. It is the seat of a Greek archbishop. Pop. in 1901, 42,849, including Bulgarians, Turks (who have many mosques), Greeks, etc. Philippopolis was founded by Philip of Macedon and under the Romans was the capital of the province of Thrace. In 1818 it was almost entirely destroyed by an earthquake. The Turks were defeated here by the Russians in Jan., 1878.

Philistia (the country of the Philistines), in ancient geography the southern portion of the coast-land of Palestine. The 5 chief cities of the Philistines were Ashdod, Gaza, Ashkelon (Ascalon), Gath, and Ekron. From the Hebrew name of the region, Pelesheth, was derived the name Palestine. The Philistines waged fierce wars with the Hebrews for centuries and at the close of the eighth century B.C. became subject to Assyria. Their country was subsequently a battle-ground of the Babylonians and Egyptians. It was a part of the Persian Empire, was conquered by Alexander the Great, and formed part of the realm of the Seleucidæ.

Phillack, a town of England, in Cornwall, 8 miles WSW. of Redruth. Pop. in 1901, 3881.

Pisa, pee′zȧ (anc. Pi′sæ), a walled city of Italy, in Tuscany, capital of the province of Pisa, on the Arno, 6 miles from its mouth and 12 miles NNE. of Leghorn. Lat. 43° 43′ N.; lon. 10° 24′ E. Pop. in 1901, 28,046 (commune, 61,321). Pisa long ago ceased to be an important place and its population has dwindled, but its noble edifices are memorials of the time when it was one of the most prominent cities of Christendom. It has preserved its lofty walls, which measure about 5 miles in circuit. The Arno within the city is bordered by fine quays, the Lungarno, and crossed by 4 bridges. The pride of Pisa is the Piazza del Duomo, on the northern edge of the city, on which is the group of structures consisting of the marble cathedral, dating from the latter part of the eleventh century, with a magnificent façade and beautiful dome; the famous Campanile, or leaning tower (1174–1350), built of white marble, fronted with 207 columns, 179 feet in height, and 50 ft. in diameter (the topmost story overhanging the base about 13 ft.); the celebrated Campo Santo, or cemetery, containing a huge mound of earth brought from the Holy Land in the twelfth century and ornamented with frescoes by painters of the Tuscan school; and the baptistery (1153–1278), covered with a conical dome and 190 ft. high. Among the interior ornaments of the cathedral are some magnificent bronze doors and a remarkable pulpit, the work of Niccola Pisano, the founder of the Pisan school of sculpture. The other principal edifices include several notable churches, the Museo Civico (with works of the early Tuscan painters and sculptures), the extensive buildings of the university (La Sapienza), the communal palace, and the Loggia de' Banchi, now the corn exchange. The ancient university of Pisa, dating from the fourteenth century, is still a great centre of education, and it has faculties of law, medicine, philosophy, mathematics, engineering, etc., various university institutes, museum of natural history, botanical garden, and a library of 120,000 volumes. It was attended in 1900–01 by 1100 students. Three and a half miles N. of the city are the Bagni di Pisa, medicinal baths, frequented by many visitors. The city is an archbishop's see. From about the year 1000 Pisa figures as a powerful maritime republic, and at the height of its prosperity the city contained about 150,000 inhabitants. The Pisans waged fierce and interminable wars with their rivals the Genoese, finally sustaining a crushing defeat in 1284. At the beginning of the fifteenth century the republic passed under the dominion of Florence. Pisa is the birthplace of Galileo.

Pittsburg, or Pittsburgh, a city and the capital of Allegheny co., Pa., and a port of entry, is 260 miles (direct) W. by N. of Philadelphia, on the Pennsylvania, the Baltimore and Ohio and other railroads. Lat. 40° 26′ N.; lon. 80° 2′ W. Within the angle formed by the Alleghany and Monongahela rivers where they meet and give birth to the Ohio lies the original Pittsburg, the inner point being the site of the old Fort Duquesne of the French, and of the later Fort Pitt, the nucleus of the city. The greater part of the closely built-up portion of the city, with river-frontage on both the NW. and the SW. extending over several miles, lies on the flat river-tongue and the gradually ascending slopes, which ultimately attain elevations of 400–500 feet. Until 1872 the city was bounded by the two rivers, but during that year it crossed the SW. boundary by the annexation of the extensive manufacturing district formerly comprised in the boroughs of Temperanceville, Union, West Pittsburg, Allentown, Mount Washington, Birmingham, East Birmingham, South Pittsburg, etc., and since that time it has been further enlarged through annexation. Pittsburg is the second city of the state in population and the leading centre of the iron- and steel-manufacturing industries of the country, the product of pig-iron being about one-fourth that of the total product of the United States, and of steel more than one-half. The quantity of iron used by the Pittsburg furnaces and mills is upward of 5,000,000 tons annually, the capacity of some of the individual steel- and iron-works being equal to the production of from 500,000 to 1,000,000 tons of metal (pig-iron, steel rails, Bessemer steel, armor-plate, hearth-steel) per year. Pittsburg has some of the largest blast-furnaces in the world and also some of the most extensive works for the construction of steel bridges. Other leading industries are the manufacture of plate- and lamp-glass, electrical appliances, railroad-brakes, cars and locomotives, engines, stoves, silver-plated and other wares, hardware, cork, aluminium, etc. The city is in the centre of one of the richest coal regions of the globe, and it is also the outlet of the vast oil-fields of the Alleghany and Ohio river basins. Natural gas is a far-reaching product of the region and is extensively used in the city for both manufacturing and domestic purposes. The homes of "the iron city" are chiefly on the highlands to the E. The various parts of Pittsburg and its suburbs are connected by numerous substantial bridges and lines of steam, cable, and electric cars. Among the notable buildings of Pittsburg are the court-house, city-hall, post-office, the Exposition buildings, the Roman Catholic and St. Paul's cathedrals, United States arsenal, jail, Carnegie Library and Institute building (with an extensive library, music-hall, art-gallery, and natural-history museum), and the Phipps Conservatory, situated in Shenley Park, to the E. of the city but in the heart of the residential quarter. Among the educational institutions are the Western University of Pennsylvania (mainly located in Allegheny), the Pennsylvania College for Women, Carnegie Institute (already referred to), Pittsburg Academy, Bishop Bowman Institute, and Pittsburg College of the Holy Ghost. There are numerous charitable institutions (asylums, hospitals). A zoological collection is maintained in Highland Park. Between Pittsburg and its neighbor, Allegheny, there is close community of interest in all matters pertaining to social and educational advancement, and together they form a centre of culture as well as of great industrial life.

History.—Fort Duquesne, a French trading-post, erected in 1754, occupied the site where Pittsburg now stands. In 1755 the British despatched an expedition under Braddock to capture it, which met with disaster. They took the place in 1758, and erected a fortification which they called Fort Pitt, in honor of William Pitt, then prime minister of England. The town of Pittsburg began to be settled in 1765. It became a county town in 1791, was incorporated as a borough in 1804, and was chartered as a city in 1816. Pop. in 1810, 4768; in 1820, 7248; in 1830, 12,542; in 1840, 21,115; in 1860, 49,217; in 1870, 86,076; in 1880, 156,389; in 1890, 238,617; in 1900, 321,616.

It has steep and tortuous streets. Of the numerous ecclesiastical edifices the principal are the twelfth-century Romanesque-Gothic cathedral; the Temple Saint-Jean, a baptistery dating from Merovingian times; the Romanesque church of Notre Dame la Grande, dating from the eleventh century, with a splendidly sculptured façade; and the church of Sainte Radegonde, erected in the eleventh century on the site of an ancient edifice and containing the sarcophagus of the saint. The most interesting secular buildings are the modern Renaissance Hôtel de Ville, containing a museum of art and a natural-history museum, and the Palais de Justice. The town possesses a university and a library of 65,000 volumes. The industries comprise brewing and the manufacture of hosiery, cloth, etc. Poitiers was anciently the capital of the Gallic tribe of the Pictones, whence its name. It was an early focus of Christianity. Its first bishop was Saint Hilary in the fourth century. Between Poitiers and Tours Charles Martel overwhelmed the Saracens in 732, and here in 1356 the English under the Black Prince vanquished the French king John the Good. Pop. in 1901, 31,785 (commune, 39,886).

Poland (Pol. Polska, pōl'skȧ, meaning "flat land;" L. Polo'nia; Ger. Polen, po'lẹn; Fr. Pologne, po'loñ'), an extensive country of central Europe, which existed for many centuries as an independent and powerful state, but, having fallen a prey to internal dissensions, was dismembered in the latter part of the eighteenth century by Austria, Prussia, and Russia, and incorporated with their dominions. In the early part of the seventeenth century the Polish kingdom had an area of about 375,000 sq. m., making it the most extensive realm (not counting colonial possessions) in Christendom, excepting Russia. It stretched from the frontiers of Hungary and the Turkish Empire to the Baltic, and from Germany far E. into what is now Russia. In the W. it reached almost to the Oder and on the E. it extended far beyond the Dnieper. The territory thus marked out formed a compact kingdom, embracing Great and Little Poland (in the extreme W. and SW.), West Prussia, Masovia (with Warsaw), Cujavia (W. of Masovia), Podlachia (E. of Masovia), Red Russia (part of modern Galicia and a district to the N.), Volhynia, Podolia, the Ukraine, Lithuania, and Livonia. Lithuania, which was completely merged in the Polish realm in 1569, comprised a vast area in the NE. At the time of the first partition, in 1772, the area was not far from 300,000 sq. m., and the population is estimated to have been about 12,000,000. Of the territories comprised in the Polish kingdom in the seventeenth century, about six-sevenths are now included in the Russian Empire. Of this about one-sixth, the extreme western portion, the heart of old Poland (with Warsaw), constitutes what is known as Russian Poland. The Austrian portion of Poland constitutes the crown-land of Galicia, in which the Poles are politically dominant, although somewhat outnumbered by the Ruthenians. The portion of the old kingdom included in Prussia constitutes the provinces of Posen and West Prussia, in the former of which the Polish language predominates, and the district of Ermland, in East Prussia. The number of Poles in the world is in round numbers about 15,000,000. There are about 8,000,000 in Russia, of whom about three-fourths live in Poland proper. Prussia has over 3,000,000 Poles and Austria nearly as many. There is a large Polish population in the United States.

The Poles are numerically the most important body of the Slavs next to the Russians, to whose language the Polish is most closely related. Their religion is Roman Catholic. Russia is making great efforts to Russianize the Poles within her dominions, and in Lithuania and other portions of the old Polish kingdom outside of Poland proper Russification has made great progress. Prussia is also prosecuting the policy of denationalizing the Poles, but has met with little success. In Austria-Hungary the Poles are untrammelled in their political activity, and there Cracow (the capital of the Polish kingdom previous to the seventeenth century, when it was superseded by Warsaw) and Lemberg are foci of Polish national life.

Poland was raised to the rank of a kingdom about the beginning of the eleventh century. It had for some time already been under the rule of the dynasty of Piast, and Christianity had been introduced shortly before. Upon the death of Casimir the Great, in 1370, the male line of the Piasts became extinct. Casimir was succeeded by Louis the Great of Hungary, whose daughter and successor Hedwig married, in 1386, Jagellon, grand prince of Lithuania, who became Ladislas II. of Poland. The dynasty of Jagellon came to an end in 1572, and the crown of Poland (which now formed one commonwealth with Lithuania), was made elective. The first partition of Poland, between Russia, Austria, and Prussia, took place in 1772; the second, between Russia and Prussia, in 1793; the third, between Russia, Austria, and Prussia, in 1795. In 1807 Napoleon created a semi-independent state out of a fragment of Poland, to which the name of Duchy of Warsaw was given. This disappeared in 1813, and out of the bulk of it the congress of Vienna, in 1815, constituted a new kingdom of Poland, which was placed under the Russian dynasty. In consequence of the insurrection of 1830–31 the Poles were deprived of their constitutional liberties. The name Kingdom of Poland is still given to this portion of the Russian territories, but the country is now treated in all respects as an integral part of the Russian Empire, and constitutes the so-called Governments of the Vistula, under the administration of a special governor-general. It is bounded N. and W. by the territories of Prussia, on the NE. and E. by the Russian governments of Kovno, Vilna, Grodno, and Volhynia, and S. by Galicia. It is divided into the governments of Warsaw, Kalisz, Piotrkow, Radom, Lublin, Plock, Kielce, Siedlce, Lomza, and Suwalki. Area, 49,150 sq. m. Pop. in 1897, 9,455,943. About two-thirds of the inhabitants are Poles. There are about 1,500,000 Jews, 1,000,000 Russians, 250,000 Germans, and 300,000 Lithuanians. The capital is Warsaw.

The most characteristic surface feature of Russian Poland is its uniformity. With the exception of the Carpathian foothills along its SW. boundary, it presents an almost unbroken plain, composed partly of gently waving slopes, partly of rich alluvial flats, and in part of sandy tracts and morasses. One of the highest elevations of the land is the Lysa Gora, or Bald Mountain, in the S. near Kielce, 1850 (2000?) feet. The drainage is wholly into the Baltic Sea. The principal streams are the Vistula, with its tributaries the Wieprz, Pilica, and Bug (with the Narew); the Warthe and Prosna, tributaries of the Oder; and the Niemen.

The country is in part an excellent agricultural region, and in 1903 there were 11,366,743 acres under crops, the cereals being, in the order of their importance, rye, oats, barley, and wheat. Flax and hemp are extensively cultivated. The forests of Poland still cover an area of nearly 7,000,000 acres, and furnish valuable timber. The minerals include the ores of iron, copper, and zinc, salt, and coal, the last named being extensively mined, especially in the Dombrowa region. The most important manufactures of the country are those of metal products, textiles (mainly in the region about Lodz), sugar, and liquors. Poland has a single university, that of Warsaw.

Polynesia, pol'e-nee'she-ą (i.e., "many islands"), includes, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, the multitude of minor islands scattered over the Pacific Ocean in a belt chiefly within 30 degrees on each side of the equator, from lon. 135° E. to 130° W. The islands are distributed into numerous groups, having a general direction from NW. to SE. The principal groups to the N. of the equator are the Pelew, Ladrones, Caroline, Marshall (Ralick and Radack), Gilbert or Kingsmill (partly S. of the equator), and Hawaiian Islands, all of which, except the last, belong to what is called Micronesia. S. of the equator are the Bismarck Archipelago, Fiji, Friendly (or Tonga), Samoan, Solomon, New Hebrides, New Caledonia, Loyalty, Banks, Society, Marquesas, Low (or Tuamotu), Austral, Cook (or Hervey), and other minor groups, besides numerous detached islands, as Easter and Pitcairn islands. It is customary with late writers to exclude Micronesia, and with nearly all to exclude Melanesia (which see), from the Polynesian limits, chiefly for linguistic and ethnological reasons. On the other hand, many geographers include New Zealand within the application of the term. The islands are for the most part of coral formation, many presenting the regular atoll form, with circular reefs and lagoons. Others present fringed and elevated reefs and some active volcanoes, the summits of the mountains ranging to upward of 13,000 feet (Hawaii Islands). In the lower coral islands the elevations do not generally exceed 500 feet.

The temperature of Polynesia is comparatively moderate and the climate is delightful and salubrious. Mean annual temperature of the Hawaiian Islands, 72°; temperature of the Society Islands, from 70° to 80°, rarely reaching 90°. The SE. tropical wind generally prevails, but NW. and SW. winds are not uncommon. Hurricanes are rare and earthquakes slight and not of frequent occurrence. The refreshing coolness of the trade-winds and a regular but not excessive supply of moisture are favorable to a luxuriant vegetation. There are, however, many uninhabited islands where vegetation is scanty and the water-supply very deficient. The fauna of most of the Polynesian islands is a deficient one, markedly wanting in mammalian and reptilian types and exhibiting in numbers of distinctive generic and specific forms the influence of long-continued isolation.

The natives of Polynesia are in general a well-formed, tall, active, and intelligent people. They consist of three or more apparently distinct races having Malay affinities, and are spread over all the central and E. portions of Polynesia, where one common language, varying in dialects, is spoken; but in Micronesia the languages are of a distinct character, and in the SW. the people and languages approximate to the Melanesian, if not to the negrillo type.

Some of the islands, as the Ladrones, were discovered by Magellan in 1521, and the Marquesas by Mendaña in 1595; but it was not till the second half of the eighteenth century that Wallis, and especially Cook, explored and described the leading island groups. After a time missionaries succeeded in spreading Christianity and, to some extent, civilization in the principal islands. Cannibalism still prevails in some groups. The population varies continually, on account of wars, migrations, and pestilence; but no proper data exist for affording even an approximation to the real numbers. For further information see the individual groups and islands.

Pomerania, pom-e-rā′ne-ȧ (Ger. Pommern, pom′-mẹrn), a province of Prussia, stretching along the Baltic, and having landward the provinces of West Prussia and Brandenburg and Mecklenburg. Area, 11,629 sq. m. Pop. in 1890, 1,520,889; in 1900, 1,634,659, chiefly Protestants. The surface is mostly level in the coast region and rises in the interior into a hilly country. The principal river is the Oder, which divides the province into two parts, known as Hinterpommern and Vorpommern,—i.e., Farther and Hither Pomerania, respectively E. and W. of the river. The Oder discharges into the extensive lagoon called the Stettiner Haff. The islands of Rügen (frequented as a sea-side resort), Usedom, and Wollin are comprised in the province. There are many lakes in the province, some of them close to the coast. The principal crops are cereals, potatoes, beets, and tobacco. Pomerania is a region of large agricultural holdings. Large numbers of cattle are reared and smoked fish and smoked geese are important products. There are vast ship-building yards at Stettin. The province consists of the government-districts of Stettin, Stralsund, and Köslin. The capital is Stettin. The town of Greifswald is the seat of a noted university. Pomerania was occupied at the beginning of the Middle Ages by the Wends, a Slavic people, and it was ruled by Slavic princes down to 1637. By the Peace of Westphalia, in 1648, Brandenburg came into possession of the greater part of Farther Pomerania, and Hither Pomerania passed to Sweden. In 1720 Sweden ceded a large portion of her Pomeranian possessions to Prussia. In 1814 the remainder of Swedish Pomerania was given to Denmark, and in the Congress of Vienna (1814–15) this was transferred to Prussia.

Pompeii, pom-pā'yee, an ancient city of Campania, Italy, the remains of which are near the sea, 15 miles by rail SE. of Naples. It was overwhelmed (together with Herculaneum) by the first recorded eruption of Vesuvius, about 5 miles distant, the full activity of which began on Aug. 24, A.D. 79, and culminated in the cataclysm of the day following. At the time of its destruction the city was situated on the navigable Sarnus (the modern Sarno), from which it has since been separated by a deflection of the stream. For more than sixteen centuries Pompeii's existence appears to have been unknown and its name almost forgotten. But in 1748 ditch-cuttings accidentally revealed the ruins of the buried city, which soon became an object of attention. Excavations were commenced in 1755, and have been continued to the present time. Pompeii, which was founded by the Oscans, and which appears for the first time in history about 310 B.C., was enclosed by walls (with a circumference of 2843 yards), entered by 8 gates, and had numerous streets (14–24 feet in width), paved with lava, terraced houses of one and two stories, shops (the shop-signs being still plainly visible), mansions of a superior order and richly decorated with mural paintings, mosaics, and sculptures, a chalcidicum (or market-place and forum), theatres (one accommodating 5000 spectators), temples, baths, etc. An amphitheatre at the SE. end of the town gave accommodation to 20,000 spectators. At the time of its destruction Pompeii was a Roman city of third rank, and contained a population, it is thought, of 25,000–30,000. Probably less than 1500 of these perished. The city was buried beneath a cap of pumice, tuff, and ash, having a thickness of 15–20 feet, much of which has been removed, revealing objects of all kinds in an extraordinary state of preservation. Most of the earlier objects removed from Pompeii are deposited in the Museo Nazionale at Naples. The place was largely wrecked by an earthquake in the year 63, but it would seem that the destruction had been in greater part repaired when the volcanic blow came 16 years later.

Porto Rico, PŌR'to ree'ko (Sp. Puerto Rico, pwĕr'to ree'ko,—i.e., "rich port"), an island of the United States in the West Indies, the fourth in size of the Antilles, E. of Haiti and W. of the Virgin Islands, between about lat. 17° 50′ and 18° 30′ N. and lon. 65° 36′ and 67° 15′ W. Under its jurisdiction are the Vieques, Culebra, and Mona islands, and a number of minor islets. Area, 3606 sq. m. Length, about 100 miles. A range of mountains (known in different parts as the Cordillera Central, Sierra de Cayey, Sierra de Luquilla, etc.) runs through the island from E. to W., its loftiest peak, El Yunque, being 3700–3800 feet high. In the interior are extensive savannas, on which numerous herds are pastured, and along the coasts are tracts of level, fertile land. Nearly the whole of the N. coast is lined with navigable lagoons; none of the streams are navigable, except for short distances immediately above their mouths. There are numerous bays and creeks deep enough for vessels of considerable burden; but the N. coast is subject to heavy ground seas, which beat against the cliffs with great violence. Porto Rico lies within the region of the NE. trade-winds. The climate is generally salubrious, showing a mean annual temperature of 78° to 82°. The maximum summer heat is about 100°, while the minimum temperature is 56° on the lowlands, and considerably less on the interior mountains. The annual rainfall at San Juan is about 60 inches, but at certain points on the NE. coast it reaches 100 inches or even more. The island has been frequently visited by hurricanes, a particularly disastrous one having been that of Aug. 8, 1899. Remains of the former great extent of primeval forest are still to be found on the upper mountain slopes, but the major part of the island is now under cultivation or in farms. The native vegetation includes many of the common tropical types, resinous and medicinal plants, palms, tree-ferns, lobelia, ebony, cedar, and sandal-wood. The indigenous fauna is very scanty, and the mammals are represented only by bats, the lesser rodents, and the agouti. There seem to be no noxious reptiles, and the insect pests are not numerous. The most characteristic animal is a giant land-tortoise. The minerals include gold, copper, iron, molybdenite, mercury, platinum, nickel, etc., but the mineral resources would appear to be limited. There are extensive phosphate deposits along the S. coast, and guano has been largely worked in Mona Island, off the W. coast. The area of the land-surface under actual cultivation is probably not much short of 25 per cent. of the whole area. The chief product of the island is coffee, grown at elevations of 600–3500 ft., of which the yield in 1903 was 33,450,000 pounds. Upward of 60,000 acres are under sugar cultivation, and 14,000 under tobacco (with an annual yield of some 12,000,000 pounds). The fruit product (bananas, pineapples, oranges, etc.) is also very large. The salines yield a vast quantity of salt (about 10,000,000 pounds annually) and are a source of considerable wealth. There are as yet no manufactures of any importance. The value of the exports in 1903–04 was $16,013,390, of which upward of $11,000,000 went to the United States (sugar, $8,688,951; tobacco, $1,721,062). The value of the imports was $12,685,984 ($11,500,000 from the United States). Much attention has latterly been given to stock-raising, and cattle are exported in considerable numbers to the Lesser Antilles and Europe. Means of internal communication are scanty, the total length of good roadways hardly exceeding 400 miles. Most of the lines of communication are mere trails. There are about 140 miles of railway. The executive authority of the island is vested in a governor, assisted by an executive council, and a house of delegates. The island is divided into the 7 departments of Aguadilla, Arecibo, Bayamón, Guayama, Humacao, Mayaguez, and Ponce. Since the occupation of the island by the United States a comprehensive system of primary education has been introduced, attendance at schools being made compulsory. High, normal, and agricultural schools have also been established. Capital, San Juan. Porto Rico was discovered by Columbus in 1493. In 1510 it was conquered by the Spaniards under Ponce de León. The numerous native population was soon exterminated as a result of the cruel treatment by the Spaniards. The island was ceded by Spain to the United States by treaty of Dec., 1898. Pop. in 1899, 953,243, of which the whites numbered 589,426.

Port Shepstone, a town and port of entry of Natal, South Africa, at the mouth of the Umzimkulu River, in about lat. 30° 45′ S. It is the centre of a sugar, tea, and fruit region.

Port Simpson, an outport of British Columbia, 550 miles from Victoria, its banking point. Pop. about 200.

Portslade-by-Sea, a town of England, in Sussex, 4 miles from Brighton. Pop. in 1901, 5217.

Portsmouth, pōrts'mŭth, a seaport, municipal, parliamentary, and county borough, and the chief naval station of England, situated within the territorial limits of Hampshire, at the SW. extremity of Portsea Island, and at the entrance to its splendid harbor, 18 miles SE. of Southampton and 65 miles (direct) SW. of London. Lat. of observatory, 50° 48′ 3″ N.; lon. 1° 6′ 12″ W. Portsmouth Harbor is 4 miles in length, with about an equal width, and its entrance is only about 400 yards across. In this landlocked haven the whole British navy might ride in perfect security. The arm of the English Channel with which it communicates is the roadstead of Spithead. The fortifications of Portsmouth, the most complete in Britain, consist of an outer line of forts on the landward side and the Spithead forts to seaward. The limits of the parliamentary borough include, in addition to Portsmouth, Southsea, a fashionable watering-resort, Landport, and Portsea, the last-named with the immense dock-yard and vast naval establishment. On the other side of the harbor, on the peninsula between it and Spithead, is Gosport. The town has few impressive buildings, those of most importance being the town-hall and the church of St. Thomas Becket. The fortifications of Portsmouth were begun in the reign of Edward IV. and the importance of the place dates from the reign of Henry VIII. It is the birthplace of Dickens. Pop. in 1891, 159,000; in 1901, 188,133.

Portsmouth, a banking post-town of Shelby co., Iowa, on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul R., 12 miles W. by S. of Harlan. Pop. in 1900, 316.

Portsmouth, a former post-village of Bay co., Mich., now a part of Bay City, on the E. bank of the Saginaw River, 2 miles S. of Bay City proper.

Portsmouth, a city, port of entry, and semi-capital of Rockingham co., N.H., 58 miles N. by E. of Boston, is situated on the right bank of the Piscataqua River, about 3 miles from the ocean, and on the Boston and Maine R. Lat. 43° 5′ N.; lon. 70° 45′ W. This city, the only seaport of the state, is built on a beautiful peninsula, formed by the Piscataqua River, and has a capacious, deep, and easily accessible harbor. It stands on a gentle acclivity overlooking the harbor and is distinguished for its healthy atmosphere, fine gardens, and profusion of shade-trees. The principal public buildings are the Athenæum (with a library and museum), custom-house, city building, music hall, and St. John's and other churches. The chief object of interest is the Kittery United States navy-yard, on Continental (or Fernald's) Island, near the E. side of the river and connected by bridge with the village of Kittery, Me. It contains 3 immense ship-houses and a large floating balance-dock. The "North America," the first ship-of-the-line launched in the Western Hemisphere, was built on Badger's Island, in this harbor, during the Revolution, and it was also in this navy-yard that the "Kearsarge" was built. Portsmouth has less commerce now than formerly, though it is still the centre of an important trade, both foreign and coastwise. Manufacturing is not very extensively carried on. The leading articles of manufacture are buttons, shoes, paper, and malted liquors. Portsmouth is the birthplace of T. B. Aldrich. The treaty of peace between Russia and Japan was signed here Sept. 5, 1905. Pop. in 1850, 9739; in 1880, 9690; in 1900, 10,637.

Portsmouth, a post-township of Carteret co., N.C., is a narrow island near Ocracoke Inlet, about 56 miles E. of Newberne. It is bounded on the E. by the ocean and on the W. by Pamlico Sound. Pop. in 1900, 150.

Portsmouth, a city, capital of Scioto co., Ohio, is finely situated on the Ohio River, just above the mouth of the Scioto River, 95 miles S. of Columbus, on the Baltimore and Ohio Southwestern and other railroads. It is the southern terminus of the Ohio Canal. Portsmouth is an important manufacturing town and its industries are represented by rolling-mills, iron-foundries and machine-shops, steel-works, shoe-manufactories, furniture- and veneer-works, stove-works, brick-yards, etc. It is celebrated as a city of homes and is surrounded by beautiful scenery. Pop. in 1890, 12,394; in 1900, 17,870.

Portsmouth, a seaport and independent city of Virginia, formerly in Norfolk co., on the left bank of the Elizabeth River, opposite Norfolk. It is on the Seaboard Air Line, the Atlantic Coast Line and other railroads. The river, which is nearly two-thirds of a mile wide, forms a good harbor, which admits vessels of the largest size. The site is level and elevated only a few feet above the sea. Portsmouth contains a large naval hospital, several academic schools, and, in its southern suburb of Gosport, a large national navy-yard, with a huge dry-dock. Ferry-boats ply frequently between Portsmouth and Norfolk. The city has railroad-shops, various manufactories, and an important export trade in cotton, pig-iron, lumber, naval stores, and vegetables. Pop. in 1890, 13,268; in 1900, 17,427.

Portugal, pōr'tu-gal (Port. pron. por-too-gål'; anc. Lusita'nia), a kingdom of Europe, forming the W. part of the Iberian (Spanish) Peninsula. It is bounded on the E. and N. by Spain and on the W. and S. by the Atlantic Ocean. It lies between lat. 36° 58′ and 42° 8′ N. Area, 34,254 sq. m. Its shape is nearly a parallelogram, with a greatest length, from N. to S., of 355 miles; greatest breadth, 130 miles.

Face of the Country, Climate.—The coast is occasionally bold, but is mostly low and marshy, and permits of a number of good harbors, but the only large indentations are the bays of Setubal and of the Tagus, on the latter of which is Lisbon. The interior of Portugal, especially in the northern half, is generally mountainous, a number of ranges stretching across the country, mostly in a NE. and SW. or an E. and W. direction, forming a succession of river-basins, while their ramifications, projecting in all directions, enclose many beautiful valleys. The loftiest range is the Serra da Estrella, a link or continuation of the central chain which stretches across Spain between Old and New Castile and between León and Estremadura. In the Malhao, near Covilha, it rises to an elevation of 6540 feet. In the NW. a branch of the Spanish Sierra Mamed, taking the name of Penagache, enters Portugal, and attains in the Peneda a height of 4500 ft. Of nearly equal altitude is the Serra de Noqueira in the NE., while somewhat loftier summits (Montemuro) extend towards the central Estrella range. The Cabo da Roca, which forms the western spur of the Serra de Cintra, and the westernmost point of continental Europe, abuts upon the Atlantic Ocean as the Promontorium Magnum of the Romans (465 ft.). The principal plains and valleys are those of Almeida, the Terra de Bragança, Chaves, Villarica, and Besteiros. Granite generally forms the nucleus of the mountains, overlaid in the N. by micaceous schist and other Azoic rocks. In the S. limestone is abundant.

Few countries, in proportion to their extent, are better supplied with large and navigable streams. The principal rivers have their upper courses in Spain. These are the Minho, in the N., forming part of the boundary between Portugal and Spain; the Douro, which first skirts the E. frontier in a SW. direction and then pursues its course W. to the ocean at Oporto; the Tagus, flowing in a SW. direction through the middle of the country; and the Guadiana in the SE. The last-named river where it reaches Portuguese territory bends abruptly to the S., forms for some distance the boundary between Portugal and Spain, then for nearly 100 miles is a Portuguese river, and at the end of its course is again a border stream. The Vouga, Mondego, Sabor, and a number of other streams have their courses wholly in Portugal. The climate of Portugal is greatly modified by the proximity of the sea and the height of the mountains. In general, the winter is short and mild, and in some places never completely interrupts the course of vegetation. Early in February the vegetation is in full vigor. During the month of July the heat is often extreme, and, rain seldom falling, the whole country, particularly along the coast, assumes a parched appearance. With the copious showers of September a second spring sets in, and the fields again become covered with flowers and verdure. Winter usually begins about the end of November. From October to April deluges of rain occur and violent hurricanes and thunderstorms are not unfrequent. The climate is generally salubrious, especially in the elevated regions. Shocks of earthquake are sometimes felt, particularly in the vicinity of the capital, which was wholly wrecked in 1755.

Productions, Manufactures, Commerce.—The flora of Portugal is an extremely varied one, and in its luxuriance and diversity of types is the richest in Europe. Many of the mountains are covered with fine forests, among which the ordinary oak and the cork-tree are conspicuous. In the central provinces magnificent chestnut-trees abound, and in the S. the date, fig, almond, and the American aloe thrive. Other types of vegetation are the rhododendron, myrtle, rosemary, numerous heaths, and the cistus, the last-named the characteristic floral form of the vast cistus-moors, with their oleander-like and superbly-blossomed shrubs. Fruits of excellent quality are common in every quarter, and in the warmer districts the orange, lemon, olive, and mulberry are cultivated on an extensive scale. The most important branch of industry is the cultivation of the vine. The well-known port wines, the produce of the vineyards watered by the upper Douro, form the staple export. Agriculture is at a very low ebb and Portugal fails, in ordinary years, to raise cereals in sufficient quantity to meet its own consumption. Wheat, barley, oats, flax, and hemp are cultivated in the elevated tracts and rice in the lowlands. Of the entire area of the kingdom somewhat more than 2 per cent. is under vineyards, 7 per cent. under fruit-trees, 12.5 per cent. under cereals, and about 3 per cent. under forest. The mineral wealth, which includes the ores of iron, copper, lead, zinc, tin, gold, arsenic, antimony, and manganese, besides sulphur, salt, and gypsum, is great, but the production in the mines is limited.

The manufactures of Portugal have acquired some importance in the larger towns. Among the products may be mentioned textiles (cottons, silks, linens, woollens), arms, porcelain, earthenware, lace, machinery, foundry products, tin-ware, cutlery, leather, gloves, corks, hats, confectionery, fine soap, jewelry, glass, paper, and tobacco. Ship-building is extensively carried on.

The length of sea-coast and the navigable rivers furnish great facilities for commerce, and railways connect the principal cities with the capital or with the commercial centres of Spain. Foreign commerce is a leading interest. The principal exports include wine, live-stock, cork, oil, sardines, fruit (particularly chestnuts, walnuts, almonds, olives, oranges, and lemons), metal-ores, silk, wool, and sumach. The largest customers for Portuguese wines are England and Brazil. The quantity of wine exported in 1903 was 49,134,590 litres of common wine and 28,827,440 litres of liqueur-wine. The principal seaports are Lisbon (the capital), Oporto, Setubal, Faro, Figueira, and Vianna. In 1904 there were 1486 miles of railway in operation.

Divisions, Colonies, Population, Government.—The population of Portugal (exclusive of the Azores and Madeira Islands) according to the census of 1900 was 5,016,267. The increase in the preceding decade was 8 per cent.

The following table gives the old divisions of Portugal and the modern districts into which they are subdivided:

	Pop. in 1900.		Pop. in 1900.
MINHO (ENTRE-DOURO-E-MINHO):		ESTREMADURA:
Vianna do Castello.	215,267	Leiria	238,755

Guarda	261,630
Castello Branco	216,608	Total	5,016,267

The Azores and Madeira Islands are generally regarded as integral parts of the kingdom proper. They have a combined area of 1236 sq. m., and their population in 1900 was 406,865. The dependencies and colonies are, in Africa, the Cape Verde Islands, Guinea, Prince's (Principe) and St. Thomas (São Thomé) islands, Angola, and Portuguese East Africa; and in Asia, Goa, Daman (or Damão), and Diu (in India), Macao (in China), and Timor (in part), etc. (in the Eastern Archipelago).

The area of the colonial possessions is about 803,000 sq. m., of which all but about 1 per cent. is in Africa. Their population is variously estimated at between 6,000,000 and 10,000,000. In 1822 Brazil, the most important of the Portuguese colonies, cut loose from the mother country.

The government is an hereditary constitutional monarchy. The crown may descend to a female. The parliament (General Cortes) consists of an upper and a lower chamber ("Camara dos Pares," or House of Peers, and "Camara dos Deputados," or House of Commons). The law of 1885 provides for the abolition of hereditary peerage by gradual process. The established religion is the Roman Catholic. There are hardly any Protestants. Ecclesiastical affairs are administered by a patriarch at Lisbon, 2 archbishops (of Braga and Evora), and 14 bishops.

Education in Portugal is in a comparatively backward state. At the head of the institutions of learning is the venerable university of Coimbra, founded about 1288. There are polytechnic and medical schools at Lisbon and Oporto, naval, agricultural, and fine-arts schools at Lisbon, and numerous industrial and academic schools scattered throughout the country at large. The National Library of Lisbon contains about 400,000 printed volumes and an immense collection of manuscripts. The language of the Portuguese is closely allied to the Spanish. The oldest extant written documents in pure Portuguese date from about the close of the twelfth century. Portuguese is the language of the Brazilians.

History.—Portugal comprises the greater part of the ancient Roman province of Lusitânia. Early in the fifth century the Suevi established a realm in this part of the Iberian Peninsula, which was swallowed up towards the close of the sixth century in the kingdom of the Visigoths. In the beginning of the eighth century the country shared the fate of the rest of the peninsula and was conquered by the Arabs (Saracens). After some centuries of Moslem domination the Christian power, organized under the kings of León and Castile, reasserted itself in this region, and about 1095 Alfonso the Valiant created his son-in-law, Henry of Burgundy, count of Portugal, the country having been so named from Portus Cale (Oporto). This was the beginning of a new state, before whose power that of the Moors receded. In 1139 Alfonso (Affonso), the son of Henry of Burgundy, after a great victory over the Moors at Ourique, assumed the royal title. In 1147 Lisbon was wrested from the Moslems. Early in the fifteenth century the Portuguese, under the auspices of Prince Henry the Navigator, entered upon a great career of maritime exploration, and for a considerable period they led the Christian world in the field of geographical discovery. Madeira and the Azores were discovered (or rediscovered) and became Portuguese possessions. Before the year 1490 they had traced the whole of the W. coast of Africa. In 1497–98 Vasco da Gama opened the sea-route to India around the Cape of Good Hope. In 1500 Cabral set up the flag of Portugal in Brazil. In the first two decades of the sixteenth century Almeida and Albuquerque founded a great Portuguese colonial establishment in the East Indies. In 1580 Portugal was subjected to the yoke of Philip II., king of Spain. This foreign domination was terminated in 1640 by a rising, headed by the duke of Braganza, who ascended the throne under the name of John IV. In the meanwhile the Dutch made successful inroads upon the Spanish-Portuguese colonial establishments. Portugal was no longer a power in the East, but it exercised sway over vast regions in South America and over a great stretch of coast in Africa. On the invasion of the French in 1807 the royal family withdrew from Portugal to Brazil. The people rose against the French in 1808 and the arms of Britain soon drove out the invaders. In 1822 Brazil separated itself from Portugal and constituted itself an empire. Portugal was thus reduced to a mere shadow of what it had been as a colonial power.

Portugal Cove, a post-village of Newfoundland, on Conception Bay, 9½ miles W. of St. John's.

Portugalete, por-too-gȧ-lȧ'tȧ, one of the ports of Bilbao. See Bilbao.

Portuguesa, por-too-gȧ'sȧ, a river of Venezuela, after a SSE. course of at least 200 miles, joins the Apure at San Fernando. Its principal affluents are the Cojede, Guanarito, and Guanaparo.

Portuguese East Africa (also known as Mozambique and the State of East Africa), a colony of Portugal, on the E. coast of Africa, bounded N. by German East Africa (from which it is separated in part by the Rovuma River), W. by the British Central Africa Protectorate, Lake Nyassa, Rhodesia, and the Transvaal Colony, and S. by Natal. Area, 301,000 sq. m., divided into the districts of Cape Delgado, Mozambique, Zambezia, Tete, Lourenço Marquez, and Inhambane, with the military district of Gaza. It is flat and swampy on the coasts, rising to a forest-covered interior, with the Namuli mountains (7500 feet), the Serra da Gorongoza, and the Manika plateau as some of the loftiest elevations. It is intersected by the Limpopo, Zambezi, and other rivers. The climate is unhealthful, the mean temperature being 70°–75°. Agriculture is largely practised by the natives (Bantus), who raise large crops of maize. Other products are cotton, palm-nuts and oil, rubber, ivory, indigo, gums, wax, coffee, tobacco, and sugar, all of which are exported. Gold and coal are worked to some extent. The railway system (the Delagoa Bay and Beira railways) aggregates 279 miles; telegraph (in 1903), 2368 miles. The region contains the ports of Mozambique, Ibo, Quilimane, Chinde, Beira, Inhambane, and Lourenço Marquez, the last-named being the seat of government. Pop. estimated at 3,120,000.

Portuguese Guinea (ghin'ee), a colony of Portugal, on the coast of Senegambia, western Africa. It includes the Bissagos Islands, off the coast. Area, 14,300 sq. m. Several rivers intersect it, emptying at the coast. It produces rubber, wax, ivory, hides, rice, palm oil, etc. Capital, Bulama, on the island of the same name. Pop. about 200,000.

Posen, po′zẹn (L. Posnania), a province of Prussia, consisting of the westernmost portion of the old kingdom of Poland, lying between Russian Poland on the E. and Brandenburg on the W. and between West Prussia on the N. and Silesia on the S. Area, 11,184 sq. m. It is a level region and is traversed from E. to W. by the Warthe, an affluent of the Oder, and the Netze, an affluent of the Warthe. It abounds in lakes, the largest of which is the Goplosee on the E. border. Marshy and sandy tracts occur in various parts and there are extensive forests of conifers. Posen is essentially an agricultural region. The holdings, as in the case of the province of Pomerania, are, on an average, very large. The soil yields bountiful crops of cereals, rye being exported in large quantities. Potatoes and sugar-beets are extensively raised. The province is rich in live-stock. The manufacturing industries are limited, being confined mainly to distilling, brewing, and the manufacture of beet-sugar, machinery, wagons, and tobacco. About three-fifths of the inhabitants are Poles (who are Catholics), and nearly two-fifths Germans (mostly Protestants). The Prussian government has recently resorted to arbitrary measures to exalt the German element at the expense of the Polish. The province is divided into the two governmental districts of Posen and Bromberg. Capital, Posen. Pop. in 1900, 1,888,055. Prussia appropriated the northern part of Posen in the first partition of Poland, in 1772, and the bulk of it in the second partition, in 1793.

Posen (Pol. Poznan), a strongly fortified city of Prussia, capital of the province of Posen, on the Warthe, 100 miles E. of Frankfort-on-the-Oder. The principal buildings are the eighteenth-century cathedral, with the beautiful Golden Chapel and fine monuments; the parish church; the church of St. Mary, dating from the fifteenth century; the old town-hall; the modern town-hall, in Renaissance style; the royal palace, containing a valuable collection of Polish archives; and the Raczynski Palace, with a library of 70,000 volumes. The Kaiser Wilhelm Library, opened in 1902, contains about 160,000 volumes. The town is the seat of a royal hygienic institute, founded in 1899, and of the Kaiser Friedrich Museum, opened in 1904. Posilipo, po-ze-lip′o, or Posillipo, a tufa hill, immediately adjoining the city of Naples on the W. It is pierced by 4 tunnels, 2 ancient ones and 2 of recent construction. The one which is known as the "old Grotto of Posilipo" was excavated about the time of the Emperor Augustus to carry the highway from Naples to Puteoli (Pozzuoli). It is about as wide as a double-track railway tunnel and very high, in some places as much as 70 feet. This tunnel has been superseded by the New Grotto constructed in 1882–85. The other ancient tunnel appears to date from the same period as the old Grotto. Among the vineyards above the old Grotto is a Roman columbarium, popularly known as the Tomb of Vergil. The name Posilipo is derived from Pausilypon (Pausilypum), the name of a villa belonging to Vedius Pollio, and afterwards the property of Augustus. This Greek appellation corresponds to Sans Souci ("care-free").

Prague, praig (Bohem. Praha; Ger. Prag, prågg; L. Praga), a city of Austria-Hungary, capital of the crownland of Bohemia, near its centre, on both banks of the river Moldau, 160 miles NNW. of Vienna and 75 miles SSE. of Dresden. Lat. of observatory, 50° 5′ 16″ N.; lon. 14° 25′ 5″ E. The river, with its numerous bridges and its islands, is a picturesque feature of the city. The most interesting of the bridges is the mediæval Karlsbrücke, with two old towers and statues of the saints, which has become a place of pilgrimage. Prague consists of 7 distinct sections. On the right bank of the river are the Altstadt, the Josephstadt (or former Ghetto), the Neustadt, and the Wischehrad, a new quarter. On the left bank are the Kleinseite, the Hradschin (the Kremlin of old Prague), and Holeschowitz-Bubna, the industrial part of the city. The Altstadt and the Neustadt are the principal seats of commercial activity. Adjoining the city are the large suburbs of Zizkow, Königliche Weinberge, Karolinenthal, and Smichow, all but the last named on the right bank of the Moldau.

The Altstadt is the most interesting part of the city. Clustered about the principal square, the Grosser Ring, are the old Hussite church, known as the Teynkirche, in which is the tomb of the astronomer Tycho Brahe; the Kinsky palace, with a valuable library; and the handsome town-hall. Among other noteworthy edifices here are the Kreuzherrenkirche, modelled after St. Peter's in Rome; the magnificent palace of Clam Gallas; the Königshof, formerly the palace of the Bohemian kings; the Rudolphinum, in Renaissance style, comprising a conservatory of music, a museum of art industries, and a splendid picture-gallery; the old university buildings (Carolinum), and the Pulverturm ("powder tower"), a relic of the Middle Ages. The most interesting features of the Josephstadt are still the Jewish synagogue, dating from the twelfth century, and the ancient Jewish burial ground. The Hradschin contains the interesting old royal palace (Hofburg). The "defenestration" of the imperial councillors from its old council chamber was the initial act of the Thirty Years' War. The most interesting edifice in the Hradschin is the venerable cathedral of St. Veit, containing a marble mausoleum of the Bohe-mian kings, the richly decorated chapel of St. Wenceslas, and a silver monument to St. John Nepomuk. Other notable structures in this section are the Premonstratensian Abbey of Strahow, containing a valuable picture-gallery and a fine library; the Capuchin monastery; and the Belvedere, a palace erected by King Ferdinand I. The quarter of the city called the Kleinseite contains interesting churches and fine palaces, including the palace of Wallenstein; the hall of the Provincial Diet, and the building of the Supreme Court.

Among the architectural features of the Neustadt, the largest section of Prague, are the stately Czech (Bohemian) national theatre, the new German theatre, the Bohemian national museum, the town-hall of the Neustadt (now used for courts of justice), several notable churches, and some of the university buildings. Prague is embellished with a number of fine sculptural monuments. Foremost among the educational institutions of Prague is the university, comprising two distinct institutions, a German university and a modern Czech university. In 1348 the German Emperor Charles IV., who was also king of Bohemia, founded the University of Prague, then the only institution of its kind within the limits of the German Empire. It soon acquired world-wide fame. In 1882 a Czech university was established by the side of the German one. The Czech university in 1901 had over 3500 students and the German about 1500. The library of the German university contains nearly 300,000 volumes. The city possesses a royal German and a royal Bohemian polytechnic institute, a school of art, a conservatory of music, and a municipal museum. Prague is the seat of distinguished learned societies. The city is, after Vienna, the largest industrial centre of Austria-Hungary. Most of the manufacturing is done in the suburbs. The products include engines, machinery, and miscellaneous metallic wares, leather, railway-cars, gloves, chemicals, cotton goods, liqueurs, articles of underwear, furniture, gold- and silver-ware, carriages, etc. Brewing and milling are carried on extensively, and there are numerous printing and lithographic establishments. The city is the principal commercial emporium of the crown-land, being a great railway centre and having the advantages of water transit on the Moldau. Pop. in 1880, 170,521; in 1890, 182,530; in 1900, 204,498. The Czech population is estimated at about 87 per cent. of the total. The victory of the Catholics over the Protestants at Prague (battle of the White Mountain) in 1620 put an end to the brief reign of Frederick of the Palatinate in Bohemia. Frederick the Great achieved a victory here in 1757. The peace of Prague terminated the war between Prussia and Austria in 1866.

Prince Edward Island (formerly called Saint John's Island), a province of the Dominion of Canada, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, between lat. 45° 56′ and 47° 7′ N. and lon. 62° and 64° 27′ W. It is washed by the gulf on the N., and separated by Northumberland Strait from New Brunswick on the W. and Nova Scotia on the S. Greatest length, 145 miles; breadth, 34 miles. In its narrowest part, near the centre, it is only 4 miles wide. Area, 2134 sq. m. The coast-line presents a succession of large bays and projecting headlands, the largest of the former being Richmond on the N., Egmont on the SW., Hillsborough on the S., and Cardigan on the E. These bays, penetrating the land from opposite directions, form isthmuses which make a division of the island into 3 distinct peninsulas. This natural division has been adopted as the basis of a nearly corresponding civil division into the counties of Queens, Kings, and Prince. The inhabitants consist of descendants of Scottish, Irish, Acadian, French, English, and other settlers, about one-half being of Scottish descent. The Lord Bishop of Nova Scotia exercises Anglican episcopal authority over the island, and the Bishop of Charlottetown the Roman Catholic authority.

The surface of Prince Edward Island undulates gently, nowhere becoming mountainous or monotonously flat, and nowhere attaining a greater elevation than 500 feet. At one time it was covered with a dense forest of beech, birch, maple, poplar, spruce, fir, hemlock, larch, and cedar; and a considerable part of the original forest still remains. The soil is very fertile and well adapted to agricultural pursuits. No minerals of commercial value have yet been discovered. The climate is much milder than that of the adjoining continent, and the air generally free from fogs. The winter is long and cold, but the summer is eminently fitted to promote the growth and maturity of all the ordinary cereals. The principal crops are potatoes and oats, but wheat, barley, pease, beans, turnips, etc., are also extensively cultivated. The fisheries are very valuable, lobster-fishing taking the lead. The oyster-beds yield about one-half of the oysters collected in all Canada. The mackerel and cod frequent more particularly the N. coast. The manufactures are chiefly for domestic use. Ship-building is prosecuted with enterprise.

Navigation to and from the island generally closes about the middle of December and is resumed about the end of April or beginning of May. During this time mails and passengers are conveyed across the Strait in ice-boats, which ply between Cape Traverse in Prince Edward Island and Cape Tormentine in New Brunswick. A railroad extends from Cascumpèque to Georgetown (147 miles), with branches from Cascumpèque to Tignish (13 miles) and from Mount Stewart to Souris, 40 miles.

The public affairs of Prince Edward Island are administered by a lieutenant-governor and a legislative assembly of 30 representatives. Justice is administered according to the laws of England. The total population of the island in 1891 was 109,078; in 1901, 103,259. Capital, Charlottetown.

This island, after having been a possession of France, passed into the hands of the English in 1763. It was at first placed under the government of Nova Scotia, but in 1768 it was erected into a separate province. In 1799 the name of the island was changed from St. John to Prince Edward. In 1873 it was admitted into the Dominion of Canada.

Providence, a township of Lancaster co., Pa. Pop. in 1900, 1680.

Providence, a city, port of entry, capital of the state of Rhode Island, and the county seat of Providence co., is situated at the head of navigation on Narragansett Bay, where the Seekonk (or Blackstone) River joins the narrow arm of the bay called the Providence River, 44 miles SW. of Boston, Mass., on the New York, New Haven and Hartford R. It is the second city of New England in population, wealth, and importance. Providence is noted chiefly for its manufacturing industries. It was at one time an important centre of foreign commerce, but this has materially declined, while its domestic trade has steadily increased. Among its more important manufactures are those of silver-ware, jewelry, tools, steam-engines, locomotives, screws, fire-arms, stoves, gymnastic apparatus, bobbins and shuttles, cotton and woollen goods, shoe- and corset-laces, webbing, etc. Other industries are dyeing and bleaching, metal-refining, slaughtering and meat-packing, and brewing. The manufacturing industries are located largely along the banks of the Woonasquatucket and Moshassuck. The city is irregularly laid out, the site being uneven. The most noted public buildings are the city-hall (in front of which is a Soldiers' and Sailors' Monument), state-house (completed in 1898), government building, Union Railway Station (1897), public library (opened in 1898 and containing over 100,000 volumes), county court-house, Rhode Island Hospital, Athenæum (with a library of about 70,000 volumes), Roman Catholic cathedral, Dexter Asylum, Butler Hospital, and Arcade, the last a business passage-way, 225 feet long, connecting Westminster and Weybosset Streets. Foremost among the educational institutions is Brown University, with handsome buildings, founded in 1764, and having an attendance in 1903–04 of 935 students. With it are associated museums of zoology and anthropology and botany, a museum of fine arts, the Ladd Observatory (lat. 41° 50′ 16″ N.; lon. 71° 24′ 0″ W.), and a university library of 150,000 volumes and 50,000 pamphlets. Other educational institutions are the Friends' School (dating from 1818), Academy of the Sacred Heart, La Salle Academy, St. Francis Xavier's Academy, Rhode Island Historical Society (with a library of 20,000 volumes), and the Franklin Lyceum. At the S. end of the city is the Roger Williams Park, containing a statue of Roger Williams, whose first landing was at What Cheer Rock, on the Seekonk River.

Providence was settled by Roger Williams in 1636. It received its city charter in 1832. Pop. in 1840, 23,172; in 1850, 41,513; in 1860, 50,666; in 1870, 68,904; in 1880, 104,857; in 1890, 132,146; in 1900, 175,597.

Prusa, the ancient name of BRUSA.

Prussia, prŭsh'a (Ger. Preussen, prois'sen), a kingdom of Europe, the chief state of the German Empire, comprising the greater part of northern Germany. It extends (not reckoning the detached little province of Hohenzollern) from lat. 49° 7′ to 55° 54′ N. and from lon. 5° 52′ to 22° 54′ E. The main body of the monarchy is bounded S. by German Lorraine, Bavaria, Hesse, the Thuringian states, the kingdom of Saxony, and Austria-Hungary (mainly Bohemia and Austrian Silesia); W. by the Netherlands, Belgium, and Luxemburg; N. by the North Sea, Oldenburg, Denmark, Mecklenburg, and the Baltic; and E. by Russia (mainly Poland). In addition, it borders on a number of German states, whose territories are partially or wholly enclosed by the Prussian dominions, or which enclose detached fragments of Prussian territory. The greatest extension of the country is from NE. to SW., a line drawn from the town of Memel, on the Baltic, to Saarbrücken, on the borders of Lorraine, measuring about 750 miles. The area and population of Prussia and of its individual provinces are as follows:

Provinces.	Area in sq. m.	Population.
		1895.	1900.
East Prussia (Ostpreussen)	14,284	2,006,689	1,996,626
West Prussia (Westpreussen)	9,859	1,494,385	1,563,658
Berlin (city)	25	1,677,304	1,888,848
Brandenburg	15,382	2,821,695	3,108,554
Pomerania (Pommern)	11,630	1,574,147	1,634,832
Posen	11,186	1,828,633	1,887,275
Silesia (Schlesien)	15,568	4,415,309	4,668,857
Saxony (Sachsen)	9,751	2,698,549	2,832,616
Schleswig-Holstein	7,338	1,286,416	1,387,968
Hanover (Hannover)	14,870	2,422,020	2,590,939
Westphalia (Westfalen)	7,803	2,701,420	3,187,777
Hesse-Nassau (Hessen-Nassau)	6,062	1,756,802	1,897,981
Rhine (Rheinland)	10,423	5,106,002	5,759,798
Hohenzollern	441	65,752	66,780
Total	134,622	31,855,123	34,472,509

The population now (1905) is about 37,000,000. In 1816 Prussia (with an area about one-fifth less than at present) contained 10,349,000 inhabitants; in 1852 (with a slight increase of area through the annexation of Hohenzollern), 16,935,000; in 1861, 18,491,000; in 1867 (within the present limits, Schleswig-Holstein, Hanover, Nassau, Hesse-Cassel, Frankfort, and Hesse-Homburg having been annexed), 23,971,000.

Surface, Soil, Climate.—The surface of Prussia is in the main a great plain, sloping gradually towards the North Sea and the Baltic. The shores of these seas are generally very low. In some places, however, as in the scalloped island of Rügen and in the deeply-indented coast of Schleswig-Holstein, the land rises steeply from the Baltic. Parts of the coast present high sand-dunes, and many stretches have to be protected against the sea by artificial dikes. The principal indentations along the Baltic are constituted by the Gulf of Danzig, the Pomeranian Gulf, and the Bay of Kiel. A peculiar feature of the Baltic coast-land consists in the extensive lagoons, separated from the open sea by long spits of land or by islands. There are 3 of these enclosed bays,—the Kurisches Haff, Frisches Haff, and Stettiner Haff. These lagoons receive the waters of the large streams that flow through Prussia to the Baltic. The principal islands of Prussia are Rügen, Usedom, Wollin, Fehmarn, and Alsen, in the Baltic, and the North Frisian Islands in the North Sea. About one-third of the territory of Prussia is mountainous or hilly. In the SE., in Silesia, on the borders of Austria-Hungary, are the Sudetic Mountains, of which the principal portion is the Riesengebirge (Giant Mountains), whose loftiest peak, the Schneekoppe (5260 feet), is in Prussia. In the western half of the monarchy are the Harz Mountains (about one-half of which region belongs to Prussia), part of the Thuringian Forest, and an extensive region of mountains and plateaus on both sides of the Rhine, including the Hunsrück, Eifel, Taunus, Westerwald, etc. The detached Hohenzollern belongs mainly to the region of the Rauhe Alb. The eastern provinces belong to the basin of the Baltic, in which the chief rivers (proceeding from E. to W.) are the Memel (or Niemen), Pregel, Vistula, and Oder (with its affluent the Warthe). The western provinces belong to the basin of the North Sea and are watered by the Elbe (with its tributaries the Saale, Havel, and Spree), the Weser, Ems, Eider, and Rhine (with its affluents the Main, Lahn, Moselle, Ruhr, and Lippe). The level region which constitutes the eastern half of the kingdom is dotted with lakes, none of which is of great size. Among the largest are the Spirdingsee, Mauersee, and Geserichsee. The various parts of Prussia present a great diversity of soil. In the N., by the side of fine farming land, there are extensive sandy tracts and large stretches of moor, heath, and marsh-land. Among these sterile tracts may be mentioned the Tucheler Heide (Tuchel Heath), W. of the Vistula, a great expanse of sand, partly overgrown with conifers, and the Lüneburger Heide (Lüneburg Heath), an extensive moorland in Hanover. With the expenditure of great toil much of this naturally unproductive soil is being gradually reclaimed. The province of Brandenburg, in which the capital is situated, is in great part a sandy plain, much of which has been laboriously brought under cultivation. Among the fertile tracts are portions of the Vistula and Oder valleys, the district about Magdeburg (on the Elbe), the region along the foot of the Riesengebirge (in Silesia), the Thuringian country, part of the Weser valley (about Hildesheim), and the mountainous regions along the Rhine and its affluents. The climate of Prussia is, on the whole, temperate and salubrious, although rather cold in the N. and in the elevated parts of the W. The mean annual temperature in the eastern part of the Baltic region is about 44° and in the valley of the Rhine about 50°. In the former territory the average winter temperature is about 23°. In the district about the junction of the Rhine and Moselle it is about 15° higher. The rainfall varies very greatly in the different parts of the country. The annual precipitation in the Harz Mountains is as high as 56 inches. In the Riesengebirge and part of the Rhine region it is about 36 inches. Along the sea-coast it ranges between 20 and 30 inches. In some of the northern districts it is less than 15 inches.

Agriculture.—About one-half of the surface of Prussia is classed as agricultural land; about one-seventh is in meadows and pastures; nearly one-fourth is woodland. Somewhat more than one-half of the land under cultivation is devoted to cereal crops. The chief cereals in the order of the acreage (as well as of the production) are rye, oats, wheat, and barley. Potatoes and beets (for sugar) are raised in immense quantities. The wines of the Rhine and Moselle are famous. Fruit-culture is very extensive. The live-stock in the enumeration of 1900 consisted mainly of 10,877,000 cattle, 2,924,000 horses, 7,001,500 sheep, 10,967,000 hogs, and 2,051,500 goats. Bee-keeping is a considerable industry. The products of the barn-yard are not sufficient for home consumption, great quantities of poultry, feathers, and eggs being imported. In some provinces of Prussia (Pomerania, Posen, West Prussia) agriculture is carried on almost exclusively on large estates.

Forests, Game, etc.—There are about 20,000,000 acres of woodland in Prussia, of which somewhat more than 50 per cent. belongs to private individuals, 31 per cent. to the state, and 13 per cent. to the communes. The greatest relative extent of forest-land is in the province of Hesse-Nassau, where it covers about 40 per cent. of the area. In Brandenburg one-third of the surface is woodland, and the Rhineland is nearly as well wooded. Silesia and Westphalia are not far behind the Rhineland. The smallest proportion of forest area is in the province of Schleswig-Holstein, where it is only about 7 per cent. Somewhat more than two-thirds of the forest area consists of conifers. Game abounds, the quadrupeds comprising deer, hares, rabbits, wild-boars, foxes, and wild-cats, besides smaller mammals. Feathered game is varied and plentiful. In spite of the extensive coast-line and the many rivers and lakes, the fisheries of Prussia are far from supplying the needs of the inhabitants.

Mineral Products.—Prussia holds the leading place among the countries of continental Europe in the extent of its mineral resources. The value of the mineral product in 1901 was $287,000,000. The leading product is coal. The quantity mined in 1901 was 101,000,000 metric (approximately "long") tons, valued at $231,000,000. The coal regions are the Rhineland, Westphalia, Hanover, Saxony, and Silesia. Brown coal (lignite) is also found in vast deposits, especially in Saxony, Brandenburg, Silesia, the Rhineland, and Hesse-Nassau. The yield in 1901 was 37,500,000 tons, valued at $22,000,000.

Prussia is a great iron-producing country. The deposits occur mainly in the regions which yield the bulk of the coal supply. The iron-ore mined in 1901 amounted to 3,832,000 tons, valued at nearly $10,000,000. Copper (mainly in Saxony) and zinc (mainly in Silesia) were mined in that year to the extent of 765,000 tons (valued at nearly $6,000,000) and 644,500 tons (about $5,000,000) respectively. Large quantities of lead are obtained in the Rhineland, Silesia, Hesse-Nassau, and Hanover. Other metallic products are silver, gold, cobalt, nickel, arsenic, manganese, and pyrite. Prussia possesses vast riches in various kinds of salts, including common salt, kainite, chloride of potassium and other potassium salts, Glauber salt, etc. The town of Stassfurt, in the province of Saxony, is noted for the great deposits of rock-salt and kainite in its vicinity. The product of salts in 1901 was valued at about $17,000,000. Amber is found along the shores of the Baltic. Prussia has a number of noted mineral springs, among which are those at Homburg, Wiesbaden, Ems, Schlangenbad, Langenschwalbach, Soden, Aix-la-Chapelle, Warmbrunn, and Salzbrunn.

Manufactures, Internal Communications, etc.—Prussia ranks next to England among the states of Europe in the extent of its iron- and steel-industry. The production of raw iron and steel is carried on mainly in the Rhineland, Westphalia, and Silesia. More than 5,000,000 tons of pig-iron were produced in 1901. The Rhineland and Westphalia are among the most important seats of the manufacture of iron and steel in the world. The leading centre of this industry is Essen, where are located the Krupp ordnance and armor-plate works. Remscheid and Solingen are noted for their steel-wares. Berlin and other large cities have great locomotive- and car-works and machine-shops. Stettin has become one of the principal seats of the ship-building industry in the world. Prussia occupies a commanding position in the textile industry, which is carried on most extensively in the Rhineland, Westphalia, and Silesia. Aix-la-Chapelle is noted for its woollen stuffs, and Bielefeld (in Westphalia) for its linen, while Krefeld and Elberfeld-Barmen are great centres of the silk manufacture. Berlin is especially prominent in the manufacture of clothing, furniture, electrical apparatus, ornamental metal work, and surgical and physical instruments. Among other important manufactures of the country are beet-sugar and other food products, porcelain, glass, paper, leather goods, beer, and chemicals. Berlin now vies with Leipsic as a book-publishing centre.

The Prussian government has displayed great activity in developing the internal water communications of the country. The length of canals and canalized water-courses nearly equals that of the navigable waterways afforded by the rivers without artificial aid. There were in 1903 nearly 22,000 miles of railway in the kingdom, of which about 20,000 miles belonged to the state, the remainder being the property of private individuals. Among the leading commercial centres are Berlin, Königsberg, Danzig, Stettin, Posen, Breslau, Magdeburg, Hanover, Altona, Frankfort-on-the-Main, Cologne, Elberfeld-Barmen, Krefeld, and Frankfort-on-the-Oder. Fairs still play an important part in the trade of the country. The principal ports of Prussia are Stettin, Danzig, Königsberg, Memel, and Altona. The bulk of the sea-trade of the country passes through Hamburg and Bremen.

Inhabitants.—Of the total population of Prussia in 1900 (in round numbers, 34,500,000), about 30,400,000 were German-speaking. The largest non-German element is the Polish, which numbers more than 3,000,000 people, dwelling mainly in Posen (where they are most numerous), Silesia, East Prussia, and West Prussia. There are besides about 400,000 Slavs, comprising Mazurs (East Prussia), Kassubs (West Prussia and Pomerania), Czechs (Silesia), and Wends (Brandenburg and Silesia). There are about 100,000 Lithuanians in East Prussia. Schleswig-Holstein contains upward of 125,000 Danes. The Dutch number about 75,000, and there are considerable numbers of Frisians and Walloons. Of the total population in 1900, 21,800,000 were Protestants, 12,100,000 Catholics, and nearly 400,000 Jews. The Catholics predominate numerically in the Rhineland, Hohenzollern, Posen, Silesia, Westphalia, and West Prussia. The Protestant church in Prussia, outside of the provinces annexed in 1866, is under the Evangelical High Consistory at Berlin. In the new provinces it is under the ministry of public worship. Prussia has 9 universities, as follows: Berlin, Breslau, Bonn, Greifswald, Halle, Königsberg, Göttingen, Marburg, Kiel.

Constitution.—Prussia is a constitutional monarchy, the crown being hereditary in the male line. The parliament, or diet (Landtag), is composed of 2 chambers, the house of lords (Herrenhaus) and the chamber of deputies (Abgeordnetenhaus). The house of lords is composed of the princes of the royal family, the heads of the hereditary noble houses, a number of life peers (chosen by the king from among the rich landowners, prominent manufacturers, and other notables), representatives of universities, the burgomasters of the large cities, and others. The chamber of deputies, or lower house, consists of 433 members, chosen for a term of 5 years by indirect election, the indirect voters being divided into 3 classes, the respective categories representing varying voting powers, dependent upon the amount of direct taxes paid by the voters. By the constitution of the German Empire the king of Prussia is German Emperor. Prussia is entitled to 17 votes in the Bundesrat out of a total of 58 and has 236 deputies in the Reichstag out of a total of 397. The kingdom is divided into provinces, each under a governor (Oberpräsident). The provinces are divided into government-districts and these again into circles. The capital of the country is Berlin. The highest court for the kingdom is the Imperial Supreme Court at Leipsic.

History.—The nucleus of the Prussian kingdom is Brandenburg. (See BRANDENBURG.) The country takes its name from the Prussians (Borussians), a people akin to the Lithuanians, who have been long extinct. In the thirteenth century the heathen Prussians, whose home was on the Baltic Sea, in the region comprised in the modern provinces of East and West Prussia, were conquered by the crusading Teutonic Knights, who spread Christianity with fire and sword. They Germanized the subjugated country and built cities. They were joined by the Knights Swordbearers, and the eastern shore of the Baltic Sea as far N. as the Gulf of Finland was subjected by its Germanic invaders. In 1466 the Teutonic Knights were forced to surrender West Prussia to Poland, East Prussia remaining in their hands as a Polish fief. About half a century later the Knights Swordbearers cut loose from the Teutonic Knights. In 1525 the grand-master of the Teutonic Knights, Albert of Brandenburg, converted their state into a Protestant hereditary realm, the duchy of Prussia, for which he did homage to the king of Poland. In 1618 the duchy of Prussia was united with the electorate of Brandenburg. It continued to be outside of the bounds of the German Empire. In 1657 Frederick William, the "Great Elector" of Brandenburg, secured from Poland a renunciation of its suzerainty over Prussia. Under this prince Brandenburg rose to the position of a considerable military power. His successor, Frederick III., assumed, in 1701, the title of King of Prussia, styling himself Frederick I. When Frederick the Great ascended the throne, in 1740, the Prussian dominions had an area of about 46,000 sq. m. (about equal to that of the state of New York), with about 2,250,000 inhabitants. They embraced Brandenburg, East Prussia, the greater part of Pomerania, part of the present province of Saxony, the duchy of Cleves, the co. of Mark, the co. of Ravensburg (Westphalia), etc. Frederick the Great wrested the greater part of Silesia from Austria in 1742. He took part in the first partition of Poland in 1772, and thus acquired West Prussia (without Danzig and Thorn), and other territories. In his reign, which terminated in 1786, the area of Prussia was increased by two-thirds, and its population rose to nearly 5,500,000. The dismemberment of the kingdom of Poland, in 1793 and 1795, vastly increased the area of Prussia. The Polish capital, Warsaw, became for a short time a Prussian city. By the treaty of Tilsit, which terminated the disastrous war with Napoleon waged in 1806–07, Prussia was deprived of all her possessions W. of the Elbe and of the greater part of Prussian Poland; but in 1815, after the fall of Napoleon, the Congress of Vienna restored to her most of the old possessions which had been wrested from her by the French (not reckoning the later Polish acquisitions), and granted to her new lands in many parts of Germany, including half of Saxony. The kingdom had now an area of 107,000 sq. m. and a population of about 10,000,000. In 1866, after the successful war against Austria, Prussia was enlarged by the annexation of the kingdom of Hanover, the electorate of Hesse-Cassel, the duchy of Nassau, Frankfort, Hesse-Homburg, Schleswig-Holstein, and Lauenburg. In that year Prussia organized the North German Confederation. On Jan. 18, 1871, William I. of Prussia was proclaimed at Versailles "Deutscher Kaiser," or German emperor. See GERMANY.

Punjab, Panjab, pŭn-jâb', or Pun'jaub' (i.e., "land of the five rivers,"—Sutlej, Beas, Chenab, Jhelum, Ravi), a province in the NW. part of British India, bounded on the N. by the Northwest Frontier Province and Kashmir, on the E. by Tibet and the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh, on the S. by Rajputana, on the SW. by Sindh, and on the W. by Beluchistan and the Northwest Frontier Province. Area, 133,741 sq. m., of which 97,209 sq. m. are directly under British control and 36,532 sq. m. in the feudatory native states. It lies between the parallels of 28° and 34° N. lat. The Punjab is mainly in the basin of the Indus, which forms part of the W. boundary and which, near the SW. end of the region, receives the Punjnud ("five rivers"), a short stream formed by the union of the Sutlej (whose chief affluent is the Beas) and the Chenab (which receives the Jhelum and the Ravi). The course of these rivers is from NE. to SW. The SE. portion belongs to the basin of the Ganges, the Jumna flowing along the E. boundary. The extreme N. part of the Punjab belongs to the region of the Himalayas, but the bulk of the country consists of great plains, which are clad with scanty vegetation and in parts are entirely arid. Where the Indus leaves the Punjab the surface is but little elevated above the sea. The Punjab has in the main a fertile soil, but except in the N. the rainfall is very scanty, so that agriculture can be carried on only in the river-valleys and in places watered by irrigation-canals or where irrigation by means of wells is practicable. The area artificially irrigated is very extensive and is being enlarged through great government works. The heat of the summer in the plains is tropical. The Punjab produces large crops of wheat, rice, and other grains, pulse, and oil-seeds. Among other products are sugar-cane, cotton, tea, and indigo. The Punjab is the greatest wheat-producing region of India, large quantities of the cereal being shipped from Kurrachi, in Sindh. Extensive areas in the S. and E. are unproductive. Great numbers of cattle, buffaloes, sheep, and goats are reared. Camels are extensively used. Large quantities of salt are obtained from the Salt Range, between the Indus and Jhelum rivers. The manufactures are almost entirely confined to house-industries, cotton-weaving occupying the first place.

More than one-fourth of the area of the Punjab is comprised in the native states, of which there are about 40, the largest being Bahawalpur, Patiala, and Chumba. The province is administered by a lieutenant-governor who is appointed by the governor-general of India. The population within the present limits (a strip of the Punjab was set off in the creation of the Northwest Frontier Province in 1901) numbered in 1901, 24,754,737, of which 4,424,398 belonged to the native states. The inhabitants of the Punjab comprise a medley of tribes and classes, the most prominent nationality being that of the Jats. The bulk of the people speak Punjabi, a modern Hindu dialect. About one-half of the inhabitants are Mohammedans and about five-sixths of the remainder Hindus. The most interesting element in the population is the religious sect (moulded by the events of their history into a nationality) of the Sikhs. It arose at the beginning of the sixteenth century and developed into a powerful military community, the tenets of the sect inculcating martial virtues along with monotheism and a well-ordered life. Their Bible is the Adi-Granth and their holy city is Amritsar. The Sikhs, whose blood in the main is that of the Jats, number upward of 2,000,000. The Sikh state reached a great height of power under Runjit Singh (died 1839), who ruled Kashmir as well as the Punjab. The native dynasties of the Punjab are in part Hindu, in part Sikh, and in part Mohammedan. The largest cities are Delhi, Lahore, Amritsar, Rawalpindi, Multan, and Umballa. Capital, Lahore. The two wars waged by the British against the Sikhs in 1845–46 and 1848–49 brought the Punjab under their sway.

Pyrenees, pĭr'ẹn-eez (Fr. Pyrénées, pee'rà'nà'; Sp. Pirineos, pe-re-nà'oce; Ger. Pyrenäen, pe-rẹ-nà'ẹn; L. Pyrenæ'i Mon'tes or Pyre'ne; Gr. Πυρήνη, Purēnē), a lofty mountain-chain, generally linked with the Alpine system, forming the boundary between France and Spain and abutting with one extremity on the Mediterranean Sea and with the other on the Atlantic Ocean. An almost direct westerly continuation is constituted by the Cantabrian Mountains, which extend along the Biscayan border of the Iberian Peninsula. The length of the Pyrenees proper, from Cape Creux (Cabo de Creus) on the E. to Fuenterrabia on the W., is about 270 miles. The system is composed of two or more nearly parallel ridges, which in their widest part have a collective development of about 90 miles and which near the centre become united by means of a remarkable rectangular elbow, in which some of the loftiest summits are found. The descent on the S. side is much more abrupt than on the N., and this face far surpasses the opposite in the boldness and grandeur of its scenery. Geographers frequently recognize as divisions of the system the Central Pyrenees, forming the main mass of the chain and included between the Col de la Perche and the Pic des Escaliers, and the Eastern and Western Pyrenees, lying respectively to the E. and W. of these points. The loftiest summits are nearly all in the central section. In the W. the crest line falls to 3000–4000 feet, while in the E. and centre it is maintained between 7000 and 9000 ft. Although eminently beautiful in their scenic features, the Pyrenees do not, as a rule, present the abrupt outlines of the Alps of Switzerland, and there are few summits that can properly be designated aiguilles or that recall the sharply serrate or penetrating Hörner. The numerous deep-lying and hospitable valleys of the Alps are also wanting, and lakes, while they are fairly numerous, are mostly of small size and hardly more than glacial tarns. The region gives evidence of extensive past glaciation, but the existing glaciers are all of small size and to be found only on the higher summits; they descend to a level of about 7200 ft. The snow-line lies at a height of 8200–9000 ft. A large part of the Pyrenean region, especially on the side of Spain, is one of barren and desolate severity, without relief in forest or meadow lands; but where, more particularly in the western sections, the rainfall is sufficiently generous and the slopes are not too abrupt, a vigorous vegetation clothes the valleys and mountains alike. The more distinctive forest trees are the conifers, the oak and beech, with the chestnut in the SE. Excepting the evergreens, trees are but rarely met with above an altitude of 5500–6500 ft. Grain is grown in some of the upper valleys and corn is cultivated even at heights of 3000–3500 ft. The wild animals include the bear, wolf, lynx, wild-cat, wild-boar, deer, chamois, and ibex, and many of the larger raptorial and gallinaceous birds. The mineral wealth of the Pyrenees, except in deposits of zinc- and lead-ores, would seem to be limited. In their geological construction the mountains present a central or nuclear mass of granitic rocks, to which are added on the flanks the more recent strata up to the Middle Tertiary, when the final upheaval of the system appears to have been accomplished.

The chief rivers rising in the Pyrenees are the Adour, Garonne, and Aude, flowing N., and the Llobregat and numerous affluents of the Ebro (Aragon, Noguera, Segre) flowing S. A distinctive feature of the upper valleys of the minor streams is their termination in cirques (or amphitheatres), such as those of Gavarnie and Troumouse, noted for their magnificent scenery. Into some of these cirques cascades descend from immense heights. The passes of the Pyrenees are sufficiently numerous, but there are few that are available for vehicles. Such are the passes of the Col de Portus (Perthus), on the route from Perpignan, France, to Figueras, traversed by Hannibal in 218 B.C.; the Col de la Perche, on the road from Prades to Puigcerdá; and the Col de Betale (2850 feet), on the road from Bayonne to Pamplona, which connects with the famous pass of Roncesvalles.

Among the loftiest summits of the Pyrenees are the Maladetta (Pic Nethou, Pico de Aneto), the culminating point, 11,165 feet; Mont Perdu, 10,994 ft.; Pic d'Estats, 10,305 ft.; Pic de Montcalm, 10,103 ft.; Pic de Vignemale, 10,792 ft.; Pic d'Oo, 10,220 ft.; Pic de Maupas, 10,200 ft.; and Puigmal, 9541 ft.,—all of these situated on the central or dividing crest; Pic Long, 10,478 ft., and Canigou, 9137 ft., entirely on French territory; and Pic des Possets, 11,045 ft., in Spain. The Pyrenees abound in thermal and mineral springs and are much visited for the relief which these afford. Among the most noted of the resorts lying within or close to the foot of the mountains are Pau, Tarbes, Bagnères-de-Bigorre, Bagnères-de-Luchon, Pierrefitte, Barèges, Cauterets, Luz, Gavarnie, Lourdes, and Amalie-les-Bains.—The peace of the Pyrenees, a treaty concluded between France and Spain in 1659, was signed on an islet in the little river Bidassoa, which rises in the Pyrenees near their western end and enters the Bay of Biscay. By its terms Louis XIV. was secured in the possession of part of the Netherlands and of Roussillon.

Lat. of observatory, 46° 48′ N.; lon. 71° 13′ 9″ W. Mean temperature of winter 10°, of summer 68°; mean of the year, 39°. The city has a remarkably picturesque situation between the two rivers, at the NE. extremity of an elevated table-land which forms the left bank of the St. Lawrence. Cape Diamond, the extremity of the table-land, rises to nearly 350 feet above the level of the river, to which it presents an almost precipitous face. Quebec has to a great extent the aspect of a quaint European city. It is divided into two parts, called the Upper and the Lower Town, the more ancient portion of the former being still enclosed by walls. St. John, St. Louis, St. Sauveur, and St. Roch's are thriving suburbs. The upper town occupies the highest part of the promontory and is fortified, having an ancient citadel, which crowns the summit of Cape Diamond and covers with its numerous works an area of 40 acres. From its position, it is probably the strongest fortress in America. Adjoining it is the Dufferin Terrace, a huge wooden platform erected on the edge of the cliff, 185 feet above the lower town, and measuring ½ mile in length. On it is a statue to Champlain, erected in 1898. The lower town, which is the seat of commerce, is built around the base of Cape Diamond, where in many places the rock has been cut away to make room for the houses. The banks of both rivers are lined with warehouses and wharves. The streets are generally irregular and narrow. One of the busiest is St. Peter Street, near the termination of which are the custom-house and the Louise Basin, with wet- and tidal-docks covering 60 acres.

In the upper town are several squares and public walks (Esplanade, Grande Allée) commanding views of varied and picturesque beauty. In the Governor's Garden is a monument to generals Wolfe and Montcalm, the English and French commanders who fell at the taking of Quebec in 1759. A monument 40 feet in height marks the spot where General Wolfe fell on the Plains of Abraham.

Among the more noted public buildings of the city may be mentioned the Parliament and Departmental buildings (1878–92), the city-hall (1894–95), the Basilica (Roman Catholic cathedral), the Hôtel-Dieu Convent and Hospital, Anglican cathedral, archbishop's palace, church of Notre Dame des Victoires, and Champlain Market. The educational institutions comprise Laval University, with faculties of theology, law, medicine, and arts, and with an attendance in 1904–05 of 358; the Seminary of Quebec; the Ursuline Convent (with buildings dating from 1686); Morrin College; Laval Normal and Model School, and other academic institutions. There are in addition the Canadian and Mechanics' institutes; the Literary and Historical Society, founded in 1824, and possessing valuable records and a large collection of historical manuscripts; and St. Patrick's Literary Institute. The principal benevolent institutions are the Marine Hospital, the Hôtel-Dieu (already referred to), the general hospital, the lunatic asylum at Beauport, etc.

The great staple of export is timber, which was formerly rafted hither, but which is now transported by the railroads and collected into coves which extend along the left bank of the St. Lawrence for a distance of several miles above the town. Quebec also exports large quantities of grain and cattle. The manufactures, especially of leather and cotton, are of considerable importance. The city may be reached by the largest ocean steamers and has many direct lines of steam communication with European and other ports. The port is closed by ice ordinarily from the middle of December to the end of April. Ferries connect Quebec with Levis, on the opposite side of the St. Lawrence.

Quebec is the seat of a bishop of the Church of England and of an archbishop of the Church of Rome. Pop. in 1832, 27,562; in 1852, 42,052; in 1871, 59,699; in 1881, 62,446; in 1891, 63,090; in 1901, 68,840. About five-sixths of the inhabitants are French and Roman Catholics.

When Jacques Cartier sailed up the St. Lawrence in 1535 he found an Indian village called Stadacona where Quebec now stands. In 1608 the French explorer Champlain founded the city, giving it its present name. In 1629 it fell into the hands of the English, but, with the whole of Canada, was restored to the French in 1632, and in 1663, when the colony was made a royal government, it became the capital. In 1690, and again in 1711, the English attempted to capture it, but met with defeat; but in 1759 it was taken by the forces of Wolfe and from that time it remained permanently in the hands of the British. An unsuccessful attempt was made by the Americans to carry the city by assault on the night of Dec. 31, 1775, when General Montgomery was slain.

Quebec, a province of the Dominion of Canada, partly in the peninsula of Labrador, and bounded on the N. by Ungava and Hudson Bay, on the E. by Newfoundland-Labrador and the Gulf of St. Lawrence, on the S. by the Bay of Chaleur, New Brunswick, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York, and on the SW. and W. by the province of Ontario, from which it is in part separated by the Ottawa River. The N. boundary is in greater part constituted by the East Main and Hamilton rivers. Lakes Abbitibbi and Temiscamingue are on the W. boundary. Area of the land-surface, 341,756 sq. m.; of the waters, exclusive of the St. Lawrence, 2900 sq. m.

The principal mountain-ranges consist of the Notre Dame (or Green) Mountains, which, from the latitude of the city of Quebec, follow nearly the whole course of the St. Lawrence on its S. side, and terminate on the gulf of the same name, between the Bay of Chaleur and Gaspé Point. They are largely in the form of plateau ridges and highlands, giving much pasture and grazing land, and rising to elevations of 2500 to 4000 feet (Sutton Mountain). The average elevation of the Gaspé Peninsula is about 3000 ft. On the N. side of the river is the Laurentian Range (or Laurentides), about 1000–1600 ft. in elevation, also in great part table-land, and rising in Cape Tourmente to 1900 ft., in the Éboulements to 2547 ft., and in Trembling Mountain, N. of Montreal, to nearly 2400 ft. The great central plain, at the gateway of which stands the city of Quebec, only exceptionally attains an elevation of 300 ft. above sea-level; it covers an area of about 10,000 sq. m. The rivers of the province are the Ottawa, East Main, and Hamilton, already referred to; the Rupert River (which flows westward into James Bay), the St. Lawrence, and a number of streams that are tributary to it,—St. Maurice, Saguenay, Outarde, Manicouagan, Moisic, Richelieu, St. Francis, Chaudière, Restigouche, etc. The largest steam craft may ascend the St. Lawrence to Montreal. See ST. LAWRENCE, SAGUENAY, etc.

The lakes in the region N. of the St. Lawrence are exceedingly numerous, and comprise Mistassini, which gives outlet to the Rupert River; Ashwanipi, supplying some of the head-waters to the Hamilton River; St. John, feeding the Saguenay; Fox Lake, Temiscouata, Temiscamingue, and Abbitibbi. South of the St. Lawrence are Memphremagog and a small portion of Lake Champlain.

The climate of Quebec, though similar to that of Ontario, is colder in winter and warmer in summer. Spring bursts forth in great beauty, and vegetation is rapid. In winter the cold is generally steady and the atmosphere is clear and bracing. Winter usually commences towards the end of November, and lasts until the end of March. The soil is in many districts rich and adapted to the growth of cereals. All the ordinary crops (wheat, oats, barley, rye, corn, potatoes, etc.) are produced, and fruits (apple, plum, cherry, pear) grow in abundance. The dairy-industry has attained great dimensions. The greater part of the province is covered with forests, consisting chiefly of white and red pine. The other kinds of timber are ash, birch, beech, elm, hickory, black walnut, maple, cherry, butternut, basswood, spruce, fir, etc. Among the minerals, copper, iron, and gold are worked to some extent. Asbestos is obtained in large quantities in the eastern sections. Mica, graphite, and apatite are among the other useful minerals. The value of the fisheries in 1902 was $2,059,307.

The public affairs of the province are administered by a lieutenant-governor, assisted by a legislative council of 24 members appointed for life, and a legislative assembly of 74 members. The capital is Quebec; the largest city, Montreal. The population in 1901 was 1,648,898. The majority of the inhabitants of the province are descendants of the French, who have preserved the French language. The prevailing religion is the Roman Catholic, the adherents of this faith numbering in 1901, 1,429,186; those of the Church of England, 81,345. Of the institutions of learning the first place is held by McGill University, at Montreal, and the second by the University of Laval, in the city of Quebec.

The province contains many grand and beautiful objects of interest to the tourist. The Ottawa and its tributaries abound in falls and rapids of an exceedingly picturesque character. There are also the Falls of Montmorency, 7 miles NE. of Quebec; the Falls of the Chaudière, on the S. side of the St. Lawrence, 10 miles above Quebec; the Falls of the St. Anne, on the N. shore of the St. Lawrence, 22 miles below Quebec; and the Long Sault, Cedars, and Lachine rapids, all on a favorite route of tourists. But the grandest scenery is to be seen on the Saguenay River, a northern tributary of the St. Lawrence.

In 1791 Canada (which had come into possession of England in 1759–63) was divided into Upper and Lower Canada (now Ontario and Quebec). In 1841 the two provinces were reunited. In 1867 they were again separated, under the names respectively of Ontario and Quebec.

Queen's County, an inland county of Ireland, in Leinster, adjacent to King's co. Area, 664 sq. m. Pop. in 1901, 57,417. The surface is mostly flat; the Slieve Bloom Mountain is on the NW. border. The principal rivers are the Barrow and Nore. The soil is fertile, with large tracts of bog. Coal, iron, copper, manganese, marl, and fuller's earth are found. The Grand Canal passes through the county. The principal towns are Maryborough (the capital), Mountmellick, and Mountrath. The county sends 2 members to the House of Commons.

Queensferry, a town of Scotland, co. of Linlithgow, on the S. shore of the Firth of Forth, 9 miles WNW. of Edinburgh. Pop. about 1500. Here is the famous Forth Bridge, completed in 1890, one of the greatest monuments of modern engineering, although architecturally a sorry production, with two main cantilever spans of 1700 feet each. North Queensferry is a small place on the Firth of Forth, opposite the above, in the co. of Fife.

Queensland, a state of Australia, occupying almost the whole of the NE. part of that continent E. of lon. 138° E. and N. of lat. 29° S., and comprising the adjacent islands of the Pacific Ocean and the Gulf of Carpentaria. It is bounded on the S. and W. by New South Wales, South Australia, and the Northern Territory of South Australia. The long Cape York Peninsula in the N. approaches to within about 100 miles of Papua, from which it is separated by Torres Strait. The Moreton Bay district was known formerly as the N. part of New South Wales and was a penal settlement till 1842. Area, 668,497 sq. m. Pop. in 1901, 503,266. A large part of the coast is shut off from the open sea by the Great Barrier Reef, which lies off the land at a distance of from 30 to 90 miles. The seaboard is 2250 miles in extent and well suited for commerce, having many noble bays, among which are Moreton Bay, Wide Bay, Hervey Bay, Port Curtis, Keppel Bay, Shoalwater Bay, Broad Sound, and Repulse, Bowling Green, Halifax, Rockingham, Trinity, and Princess Charlotte bays. Ranges of mountains, which form part of the great Australian border-system of elevations, run parallel with the E. coast at a distance of 30 to 70 miles, and give rise to numerous rivers (many of which are navigable), as the Brisbane, Burnett, Fitzroy, Burdekin, Herbert, Normanby, etc. Other ranges, less clearly defined, occupy the interior of the state and determine the water-shed for the streams flowing into the Gulf of Carpentaria (Flinders, Leichhardt, Gilbert, Mitchell), and for those that take a southerly course (Cooper, Warrego, Dumaresque, Condamine), the majority of which are tributary to the Murray-Darling system of waters. The loftiest mountain-summit appears to be one of the Bellender-Ker peaks (Wooroonooran), NW. of Rockingham Bay, which is thought to be about 5400 feet in elevation. Mount Dalrymple, lying about 100 miles southward, probably attains 4000 ft. The climate is warm and favorable to Europeans. The N. half of the country is in the torrid zone. The distinguishing feature in the climate of Queensland is the absence of hot winds and the extreme dryness of the atmosphere. Hot days are almost invariably followed by cool nights. The extremes of heat and cold common to other parts of the continent are practically unknown, the temperature rarely rising, even in the hottest and driest parts, above 95°. The rainfall varies considerably, the annual precipitation in different parts ranging from 20 inches or less to 150 inches and more in the mountainous tracts. The vegetation of Queensland is a rich and varied one, with a large representation of tropical-forest elements (palms, bamboo, canes, tree-ferns, screw-pines, etc.). Excellent timber is supplied by the red-cedar, kauri-pine, Leichhardt tree, "silky-oak," bottle-tree, etc. About one-half of the area is still in natural forest. The banana is thought to be indigenous here. The agricultural crops include rice, tobacco, corn, sugar-cane, and indigo. Various fruits are cultivated. The native fauna is of the general Australian type, the mammals being distinctly marsupials (kangaroos, kangaroo-rats, etc.), and bats. The dugong frequents some of the estuaries. Among reptiles, the crocodile may be mentioned, and among fishes, the lung-fish (Ceratodus) and barramundi. The mineral wealth of the colony appears to be large and comprises the ores of gold, silver, copper, tin, and manganese, together with deposits of coal, etc. The product of coal in 1902 was 501,531 tons; of gold, 860,453 ounces; of silver-ore, 701,312 tons; and of tin, 2085 tons.

Queensland is famed for its sheep-walks and cattle-runs, many of them of great extent. In 1902 the live-stock numbered 7,213,985 sheep, 2,543,471 cattle, 399,122 horses, and 77,202 pigs. The leading exports of the state in 1902 were, apart from metals, wool (valued at £1,311,000), sugar (£935,000), hides and skins, frozen meat, tallow, pearl-shell, and green fruit. There were in that year 2828 miles of railway open for traffic. The government is vested in a governor, a legislative council, nominated by the crown, and a legislative assembly, elected by the people. The capital is Brisbane.

Queen's River, a small stream of Washington co., R.I., falls into Charles River.

Queenston, formerly Queenstown, a post-village and outport of Lincoln co., Ontario, on the Niagara River, 6 miles N. of the Falls, and on the Michigan Central R., 8 miles from Clifton. In Oct., 1812, the Americans captured Queenston, but it was soon recovered by the British. On Queenston Heights, where the gallant British general Brock received his mortal wound, a monument 185 feet high has been erected to his memory. Pop. about 225.

Queenstown, a seaport of Ireland, co. and 10 miles ESE. of Cork, on the S. side of Great Island, in Cork Harbor. It is picturesquely built, rising amphitheatre-like on the slope of a steep acclivity. Its mild and bracing climate makes it a favorite winter-resort for invalids. The principal edifice is the Roman Catholic cathedral. The Royal Cork Yacht Club, which has its seat here, is the oldest association of its kind in the world. Queenstown, which owes its importance largely to its being a point of call for American mail steamers, was originally called Cove of Cork, but its name was changed in commemoration of Queen Victoria's visit in 1849. Pop. in 1901, 7909.

Queenstown, a banking post-town of Queen Anne co., Md., on Chesapeake Bay, about 20 miles E. of Annapolis, on the Queen Anne's R. Pop. in 1900, 374.

Ravenna is, next to Rome, the most important city of Italy in connection with the history of early-Christian art of the period from the fifth to the eighth century. Its basilicas and its mausoleums are eminently illustrative of the transition from the late-Roman to the Byzantine style. Among the most venerable of the ecclesiastical edifices is the cathedral of Sant' Orso, dating from Roman times, but in its present form mainly a work of the eighteenth century, although parts of the ancient structure have been preserved; the octagonal baptistery adjoining the cathedral, with the oldest mosaics in Ravenna (fifth century); the basilicas of San Vitale, Sant' Apollinare Nuovo, and Sant' Apollinare in Classe, all of the greatest interest in connection with the history of the art of mosaic; and the church of San Nazario e Celso, originally the mausoleum of Galla Placidia, half-sister of the emperor Honorius, likewise remarkable for its mosaics (fifth century). Among other ancient structures are the tomb of Theodoric the Great, known as the Rotonda, built in the form of a decagon, and what remains of the palace of that sovereign. The archiepiscopal palace is decorated with fine mosaics. Close to the church of San Francesco is the tomb of Dante. Ravenna possesses an academy of fine arts, a Byzantine museum, municipal collections (housed in the former monastery of Classe), and a large communal library, containing some very rare and valuable books and manuscripts. On the outskirts of the city is a column erected to the memory of Gaston de Foix, who fell here after defeating the Spanish and Papal forces on April 11, 1512.

The industries of Ravenna comprise viniculture, silk-spinning and weaving, and the manufacture of glass and musical instruments. Pop. in 1901 (including the suburbs of San Rocco, San Biagio, and Darsena), 23,451 (commune, 64,031).

Ravenna is a very ancient city. It was a great naval station of the Romans under the empire. The emperor Honorius held his court here, as did Odoacer, the first Germanic king of Italy, and, after him, Theodoric the Great, king of the Ostrogoths, who ruled Italy from 493 to 526. About 540 the city was taken by the Byzantine general Belisarius. Under the Byzantine emperors it was made in 568 the capital of their domain in Italy, which was known as the exarchate of Ravenna. In 752 it fell into the hands of the Lombards. Pepin, king of the Franks, having vanquished the Lombards, presented Ravenna in 753 to the papal see. In the latter part of the Middle Ages Ravenna was for a time an independent state and then a possession of Venice, from whom it was wrested by the pope in 1509. It remained a papal possession until 1860. In Byzantine times the archbishops of Ravenna for a time asserted their independence of the see of Rome.
